Mrs. Asquith, Selecting World's Most Lovely Woman, Gives Ideals On Beauty

"Sensitive Loveliness, Face, Form and Figure" Is Her Brief Definition.

International News Service. NEW YORK, March 23.—The Countess Minotto, wife of Count Minotto and daughter of Louis F. Swift, millionaire meat packer, is by all odds the most beautiful woman in the world, according to Margot Asquith, who started the world with a book on the "secrets" of British society. Mrs. Asquith has just completed a tour of America.

Puffing a cigarette, held between restless fingers, she gave her ideas of just what constitutes beauty. "Sensitive loveliness, face, form and grace!" "When beauty is the gift of the Creator it is as fair as art. Always beautiful women have elegance. Countess Minotto has beautiful features, face, skin—and she has sweep. The French have words for it."

"I Carry No Illusions." "Loveliness—perhaps a plain woman can be lovely. Many ugly women are lovely. But beauty is beauty. I carry no illusions. 'It does not necessarily need patrician blood to breed it. It can spring out anywhere. I have seen many fair women in America, women with the lovely expression of human interest and sympathy that I love."

"But if you ask me for really beautiful women I'll have to tell you that I have seen very few in my lifetime. Queen Alexandra of England is a beautiful woman; she is old now, but she was beautiful. Lady Aberdeen, wife of the British ambassador to Berlin, is a beautiful woman. Mrs. Lastry, of London. Yes, I've also met one in Canada—Mrs. Lawford, of Montreal."

"Mrs. Asquith let it be understood that praise from her is high praise, indeed. With a slight lift of one shoulder—a frequent mannerism—she reiterated her belief that beauty is very rare. 'You know even in England, which is famous for beautiful women, we don't produce them every day. We live more in the open in England, and the flowers and trees and hay do something to our women. Princess Mary is charming. She is racy and pretty and engaging—the sweet and fresh type of English loveliness."

Countess Minotto, wife of Count Minotto.

Mrs. Asquith made an epigram. "Your women are always in motion. They are moving." Then returning to the subject of beauty: "I Am Not Beautiful." "I am not beautiful, but I have grace, and I have beautiful children. My son, Anthony, is like me. It is wonderful to have beautiful children. I have tried to be beautiful with my intelligence, and the glow of many thoughts in my eyes. This loveliness many women can have. 'I might have been even a little beautiful myself, but I broke my nose years ago, and it spoiled me.' She mimicked her anguish. 'I didn't care. I have taught my son to dance, and I have his grace and his line. 'The famous men I have known who should have picked beautiful women, most of them did not marry. Lord Tennyson's wife was beautiful and she is the only one I remember. 'Wait, I have another lovely American in my memory, one of the beautiful women I have ever seen—Lord Sarson's first wife, your Miss Letter, of Chicago."

"I say," she declared, "I have not noticed that your women are any less womanly than ours. Of course, I love independence, but I haven't seen that they are any different as women. The only distinctive thing I can say is that they are a little more noisy. 'It seems to me that your women are governed too much by fashion. That's one thing I have never been a follower, not a leader. If you want to be a person, be original. It is shameful the way people are willing to follow one another. 'In England you find women of wealth and position running to the hospitals for the soldiers and doing a hundred things for them. Here it is not fashionable yet. What a crime! 'I shall be glad to go home," she said and put her hand to her heart. "In a way you are a strange people to understand. You are preoccupied with such funny things—crime waves and flappers and the way which Charlie Chaplin's trousers are creased. 'I must go home to my husband. I will give one more lecture—but my steamer sails April 3."
