Love's Masquerade

A Dramatic Story of Love and Romance

By Idaho McGone Gibson

AGE AND THE WOMAN

"I sometimes wonder," said Doctor George, harking back to the theme of age as a factor in love and happiness. "Why we let the passing years play such a large role in our lives—especially the sentimental part of them."

"I have known men and women at 25 who have loved just as truly and fervently—and much more intelligently and unselfishly than those of 18 or 25."

"Love I am sure was never meant to be a part of such a material thing as a calendar." Then he picked up the story again that Margaret told him.

"I do not like to think that we are the playthings of Fate, George," she said to me that last time I saw her, "and yet to our finite human minds there is so much in our lives that we cannot understand that we find no other explanation than Fate's whim, for some of the things that happen to us."

"I am wondering just what the verdict of the modern woman would be upon my case if she knew my story as I am going to tell it to you."

"Do you know, George, that I believe that with the exception of a few men here and there like yourself, the new woman would be kinder to me than most of the sex to which you belong."

Dr. Milton paused here and said to his friends: "I started to protest at this but Margaret said: 'Hear me through.' Before I leave for France I shall write you the whole story." I received it a few days ago. Here it is:

"I am going to begin by confessing, George, that I have probably broken all the laws of convention even while trying to keep the commandments intact. Whatever I have done I have always saved my conscience by saying that I have never hurt anyone but myself."

"Up until now, my friend, Harry Glendening and my conscience have been the sole custodians of the facts that I am going to give to you."

"And I can say honestly that my conscience acquits me, for whatever the verdict of the world may be, I cannot see that I have done any wrong."

"I have not hurt Harry Glendening's wife for she does not know—and will never know that Harry loved me—at least for a little while. In her arrogance and conceit she will never believe that her husband ever told another woman that he loved her."

"That is true," interrupted Davis, "for in Doris Glendening's petition for divorce she has never even intimated that Harry had ever spoken love to the co-respondents in the case, or had felt anything more for her than a short-lived passion and afterward the masculine contempt of men for the women of the street."

"I have not even hurt Harry Glendening," Milton continued after Davis' interruption, "for while Harry loved me he did the best work of his life. I really inspired him for a time to throw off that lethargy of mind and physical lassitude which was perhaps occasioned by his ill health—and do some of the things of which he is capable."

"His emotional temperament was at rest and he had time in inclination to think of other things."

"I have not even hurt myself, George, for although I have succeeded in almost breaking my heart, I have found a larger tolerance of those who are weak, a broader charity for their mistakes, and a truer and more optimistic outlook upon life in general."

"That is a lot to get in exchange for just a jagged wound in one's heart, is it not?"

"I was much older than most girls of my age when I met Harry Glendening. My short married life and the necessity of earning my living afterward had—I felt—fitted me to cope with any and all worldly experiences."

"I was sure that my judgement was sane, that I could read character much better than most women as I had made a careful study of the motives and impulses of men and women. You know I had to do this, George, for I had only the talent of facile writing and it had to earn for me my daily bread."

"My stories had become popular and quite profitable before I met Harry. I was happy in a negative sort of a way and, looking around among my friends and seeing what havoc passion had played in their lives, I said to myself: 'I will not think of love except as a phenomenon to be studied and analyzed for my stories. I will choose for myself the calm, quiet life of the prosaic and unemotional.'"

"And then I met Harry Glendening."

"It was a sad thing that I had not then learned that when a woman has come to the conclusion that she can regulate her life without love she is walking in slippery places and should take the greatest heed lest she fall."

"The meeting came about in this way. I had written two or three stories for a popular magazine and being in the city where it was published I decided to deliver my last story, which they had promised to accept, in person."

"Was Fate pulling the strings? I do not think so. Rather, I am sure that it was a curiosity and desire to see the men or women who had liked what I had written well enough to print it."

"When I reached the office my courage deserted me and I was leaving after delivering my manuscript to the office boy when a young woman was standing near said."

"Are you Margaret Earle?"

"Yes," my voice took an upward questioning tone."

"Then," she answered, "I am sure Mr. Glendening would regret very much if you went away without seeing him. We have all admired your stories so much. Will you not wait just a minute until I tell Mr. Glendening that you are here?"

Advice to Lovelorn and Others

—BY MRS. ELLSBURY—

A Daily Column of Questions and Answers Conducted by a Woman Who Knows. Address Your Letters to Mrs. Ellsbury, Care Roseburg News-Review.

Dear Mrs. Ellsbury:—As you have helped others and I am in trouble I believe you can help me. My husband and I have been married for about 12 years, and his people have always made us trouble because they never liked me, and are always running me down to outsiders, and other relatives of my husband that I don't know. They are always putting my husband up against me, and doing things to make us trouble. He has a lot of money today they are coming, and I refuse to have them in my house, and he says he will see about it. He says that he is running the house, and I can do as I like. He will let me out. We have parted three times over them, and if I tell them they are not welcome and can't stay, can he do anything? We have two children, and he says he will take them away from me. It isn't his mother and father, they are fine, but his brothers and sisters. Will you please give me a real opinion at once as I am worried sick. I would thank you to the very highest.

WORRIED WIFE.

Ans. Yes, I think you should have them come to your house to visit. What if you had a brother and sister that your husband did not like, and they sent word they were coming to visit? You would like them because they were your own relatives, and you would want them to come. Your husband feels the same way about it, and although you think that they are trying to cause you trouble, it is possible that you exaggerate. It is necessary to take a great many things from a husband's or a wife's relatives that the other party to the marriage contract does not like, but there is no way you can get out of it except by causing trouble.

I know many women that pick up the smallest thing that another says and does and exaggerates it until it assumes big proportions and causes a great deal of trouble. The wisest and best thing you could do, and the one that will bring you the most happiness is to absolutely ignore everything you hear that they say and do against you, or to cause trouble. If they are really trying to cause trouble, then you could not hurt them worse than by paying no attention to what they say or do. While at your house, treat them so courteously that you will shame them, or make them wonder if they have caused you any trouble at all. If they are trying to cause you and your husband to separate, then you are giving them a great deal of satisfaction by letting them hurt you. Devote all your time and attention to cementing the bonds of love and affection as strongly in your own home that what outsiders can do will make no impression. You can show yourself a true gentleman if you give them the utmost courtesy in your home. Never bicker with your husband over them again, or about anything else. Rather take many things in silence than have a quarrel some home.

Dear Mrs. Ellsbury: I wish to ask you some very important questions regarding elopement. Is it correct for a girl of 14 to go on a wedding tour? What should the wedding be like? Should I have a big wedding? Should I have a small one? It is very short and straggly, or should I do it up? I want to look nice. Thanking you most kindly.

Ans. If the wedding is properly chaperoned, there is no reason why you should not go. They are a part of the good times all young people have. A sweater and skirt, or middie and skirt, would be correct, as well as practical. Low heels on your shoes or slippers of course, and perhaps a tam. I judge that you want to know if you should go out riding with young men. In the day time, or early evening, if your mother approves, you might go riding. Do not let him kiss you good night. Wait until you fall in love with some nice young man, when you get to be much older, and you will be very glad that you did not let every boy that took you out kiss you goodnight. If your hair is very thin and uneven, it might be a good plan to bob it. It will cause it to grow more abundantly, if you do not cut it with an iron.

Women Planning on Rose Show

The committees of the Woman's club are busy planning to make the coming rose show an interesting event and the list of prizes will soon be ready for publication. There will be at least 18 classes under which choice blossoms may be entered. While roses alone are eligible for prizes, other flowers of special beauty will gladly be placed on exhibit. The committee asks again for empty olive or pickle bottles suitable for holding one or more roses as a great number will be required. These may be placed in the box on Mrs. Smith's lawn, and will be greatly appreciated. The date has not yet been definitely fixed on account of the uncertainty of the time when the roses would be at their best. It will be announced soon however, and it is none too soon to begin planning for the event and deciding which roses are your best.
