Glide to Hold
Picnic on 4th

Glide will observe the Fourth of July with an old-time picnic. Hon. O. P. Coshov will deliver the address, and there will be music, recitations, sports and, best of all, a good dinner. In the afternoon there will be a ball game between the Glide team and the North Roseburg team. Everyone is cordially invited to have a good time with the Glide residents.

MAE MURRAY SINGS WITH "PEACOCK ALLEY"

In "Peacock Alley," which yesterday began a two-day run at the Antlers theater, Mae Murray does the most striking characterization of her career. It is a picture which to the natural interest of a powerful love story is added the attraction of gorgeous settings and wonderful costumes.

The story opens in a small American village, shifts to Paris, back to the village, and then to New York. It pictures the adventures of a Parisian dancer who forsakes the plaudits and favors of the gay city of pleasure to become the wife of a small town American youth, only to find that her husband's people are scandalized at her and will have nothing to do with her. Then the youthful lovers try to make their way in New York, but the big city proves full of trouble which the lovers finally solve but not in the way that either expected.

Love's Masquerade

A Dramatic Story of Love and Romance
By Leah McGlone Gibson

TOO LATE

John Davis paused expectantly and lit a cigar. Clavering made no remark so Davis resumed his story of what Doris Glending had said.

"And even then, in my heart when Harry asked me to begin all over again, my pride was bigger than my love, and I said to myself that I would not forgive him too quickly. Even then I let my selfishness speak. I would not tell him that I wanted him back. I was as cold and sarcastic as I knew how to be—as I had been many times before."

"I told him that he had disgraced me and humiliated me and that I would never forgive him. 'Go to your American Beauty,' I said. 'You will probably tire of her sooner than you have tired of me. Go to her or anyone else, I am done with you forever.'"

"Doris," he said quietly, "can you not conceive that sometimes curiosity is the greatest tempter in the world? I never loved the American Beauty, but I had had a great curiosity about her. I wanted to make her answer the invitation she flung to me from her eyes. I wanted to crush the fragrance that she seemed to tell me was in her smiling mouth as she bent toward me—fragrance seemingly just waiting to be gathered."

"His way of putting it infuriated me and I said, 'Do not try to be literary with me. It may be very poetical for you to describe your curiosity and your great temptation in terms of the fragrance of flowers—it all might go with your readers and your sweethearts, but it means nothing to me. I am your wife and I know you.'"

"Whatever else I have done, Harry, I have absolutely trusted you."

"No," he interrupted, "it was not your trust in me, Doris, but your belief in yourself and your power to hold me—or rather the blinding tie of our marriage that made you so complacent."

"Whatever it may be, I shall never be complacent again," I rejoined. "Do you see that I could never trust you in the future? Why, I am not even sure that the American Beauty was the first that you have been curious about."

"By the change that rippled over his face, I knew that I had hit upon the truth, and do you know, Mr. Davis, that strange as it may seem to you, I had never dreamed there was another woman. And I guess that I just went insane at the idea that Mrs. Adams was not the only one in his life besides myself."

"Then and there I accused him of everything of which a woman could accuse a man. I said over and over the names of all the women I had known who were in the slightest degree friendly with him. I went back to the women he had known before he knew me and of whom he had casually spoken to me. Why, do you know, Mr. Davis, I even brought the name of Margaret Earle into my tirade, and of course you know how silly that would be."

"He stopped me then, however, and said, 'Doris, I see it is no use, and I do not know that I blame you, but whatever may happen in the future you must remember I came to you first in good faith.'"

"I am ready to begin all over again. I am ready to go way back to the parting of the way where you and I began. Surely, we loved each other then. Have we not loved so far away from us that we cannot coax him back? Don't send me away from you, for I am afraid, I am afraid of myself."

"He must have had a kind of prophetic sense when he said that; at least I could see that he had decided upon some course of action."

"That frightened me a little and I asked him what he intended to do."

"Oh, Mr. Davis—if he had just then asked me once more to forgive him I would have done so, but instead he said, not looking at me at all, 'I intend to make as much restitution as I can to Claire Adams.'"

"I tell you honestly that I have not seen her since long before you filed your petition, and if she does not fall me and I am not sure that she will not, I shall try to make up to her for the loss of her reputation."

"Even then I did not think that he was in earnest. Even then I could not bring myself to ask him to stay. Instead I said 'Surely you do not intend to give that woman your name, the name that I have borne?'"

"And he answered me gravely, 'That is exactly what I intend to do. I will marry Claire Adams as soon as you get your divorce from me and as soon as she gets her divorce from her husband, provided she wants me to marry her.'"

"You will never be happy, Harry."

"Why should I look for happiness any longer? I have been looking for it all my life, but I have never seemed to find it. Are you sure there is such a thing?"

"But that woman has nothing but her beauty!"

"Oh, Mr. Davis, I think now how silly I was to keep harping and nagging."

"Yes, she has something more," he replied. "She has kindness and a willingness to give—give more than she receives."

"He stopped a moment and then went out the door, and I have not seen him since. But, oh, I have heard the dreadful story—is he dying? Is he dying? Take me to see him, Mr. Davis."

"Very well, Mrs. Glending, I'll wait here until you are ready," I replied."

Davis paused again to note the effect upon Clavering.

MORGAN TYPE IS USEFUL ON FARM

Horse Is Gaining in Favor in Southwest Because of Many Sterling Qualities.

POPULAR NEW ENGLAND BREED

Stallions Are Being Used on Native Light Mares to Produce Animal That Satisfies Ranchers' Chief Demands.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Because of its superiority in activity, hardiness, and stamina, the Morgan horse is increasing in popularity in the Southwest where stallions of the breed are being used to improve the saddle horses on the range. Used on the native light mares they produce a useful animal that satisfies the ranchers' demands.

Good Show of Breed.

At the Southwestern Exposition and Fair Stock show, held at Fort Worth, Tex., March 11 to 15, this year, there was a particularly good show of the breed. Sixteen horses were exhibited and there was a strong class of aged stallions. Red Oak 5249 was the best aged stallion and champion Morgan. This horse, sired by General Gates, was developed at the United States Morgan Horse farm at Middlebury, Vt. The Morgans were placed by one of the best known horse judges in the country, who described the champion as one of the finest horses he had ever seen.

Useful American Breed.

As a result of the efforts of the United States Department of Agriculture in improving the Morgan and in stimulating a renewal of interest in this useful American breed, good breeding specimens are now found in many parts of the country. In order to obtain suitable remounts for the service the army has placed Morgan stallions in Kansas, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska and Texas. A few are owned privately in Illinois, Missouri, and Iowa, but the stronghold of the breed remains in New England, particularly in Vermont, where it was first developed.

STATE INSPECTS HATCHERIES

Poultry Industry in Wisconsin Under State Regulation—Certificates Are Given.

The Wisconsin poultry hatcheries are the only ones in the United States which are under state regulation and inspection, according to information collected by the United States Department of Agriculture. Because of the menace to the poultry industry through the sale of young chicks of inferior quality and breeding, the state department of markets and the poultry department of the University of Wisconsin have established regulations and requirements for hatchery flocks and for hatcheries, and those that fill the requirements and live up to the regulations will be known as "Wisconsin inspected and accredited hatcheries and hatchery flocks." A list of the accredited hatcheries and flocks has been prepared and published. Chicks purchased from hatcheries on the list bear the mark of the department of markets, which gives assurance that they are standard bred and from reasonably good egg-producing strains. Inspectors issue certificates to owners of hatcheries and flocks that fill the requirements.

PLANT ONLY BEST CORN SEED

Possible to Secure Results of Another Man's Life Work in Breeding and Selecting.

Perhaps in no other farm crop is there as little excuse for planting poor seed as in corn. It takes only about a peck to the acre, and the best of seed can be planted with little expense. When one can secure the results of another man's life efforts in breeding and selecting, the small cost comes back many times the very first year.

BETTER TILLAGE FOR FARMS

Small Acreage Is More Profitable When Properly Cared For Than Large Tracts.

A small farm well tilled will give better returns than a large acreage poorly cared for. If more farmers would learn this lesson, which the gardener learned long ago, we would have better farms and the owner would likely have more ready money.—Leroy Cady, associate horticulturist, University Farm, St. Paul.
