

Makers of "Canned Music" fer "from Horn Shyness"

REINALD WERRENATH

Werrenrath, Famous Phonograph Artist, Reveals Secrets of the Wax

This is to explain why you may sometimes have been surprised to find that certain popular singers never make phonograph records. They don't because they can't. They can't because they can't sing. It is not a matter of mechanical error.

The "Perfect Recorder" Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, whose records sell in greater numbers than those of any living singer except John McCormack, regarded in the great laboratory where his tests are made as the "perfect recorder," but he shakes his head when you ask him how it's done, though he's been recording since he started his musical career as a choir boy.

"What goes into the horn," he explains, "and every suggestion of forcing, every slight off-shade pitch, all straining or tightness, as well as falsetto or other cheating process shows up in the wax.

"You must sing naturally, though sometimes as I must, a little more softly or with less breath, than for the stage.

"When I made 'Tell Me Daisy,' the Schubert-Romberg song from 'Blossom Time,' however, I stood right in front of the horn without needing to move from side to side. But these things depend upon the individual voice.

Caruso's Voice Powerful
"The voice of Enrico Caruso was so enormous in volume that he was always forced to stand at least six feet away from the horn and sometimes when taking a high or loud tone, he had to go back as much as twenty feet to avoid blasting the wax.

"Another interesting and inexplicable fact is that it is sometimes possible for a soprano and a baritone to use the same horn while two tenors or two baritones may find it necessary to use entirely different instruments.

"Still another quirk in the recording game is the 'horn-shyness' which always overcomes the beginner, no matter how experienced he may be in facing vast audiences. Perhaps this uncomfortable fear of a metal horn is really his knowledge that what goes into it, as I said, will always come out, and without any ameliorating circumstances, either."

MYRTLE CREEK

Situated on the South Umpqua river at the mouth of Myrtle creek, from which the town of Myrtle Creek derives its name, is one of the progressive little cities of Douglas county. This thriving place has a population of approximately 600, and is surrounded by an excellent country, noted for its fine prunes and general farm products. In addition to general farming, there is a good deal of stock raised in the territory tributary to Myrtle Creek, and the poultry industry is also no small factor in the prosperity of the town. Adjacent timber tracts supply an almost limitless quantity of logs for the three or four sawmills operating there, and this product is shipped at Myrtle Creek to eastern or southern buyers in car lots. Another industry that Myrtle Creek has always been proud of is the fine flour mill located on the creek within the city limits. This mill has been in almost continuous operation for a number of years until quite lately, when the plant was shut down temporarily. It is expected that as soon as the harvest season is well started the mill will resume business. It is understood that the mill is under new management. The industry has always afforded a local market for much of the wheat grown in the vicinity.

These properties are east and south of Myrtle Creek, while on the ridge between Buck Fork and South Myrtle, pay-dirt is found most any place where water can be had for placing the ground. Scarcity of water prevents much development in this line. Over to the north of the town on Red Mountain, George E. Cole has done a lot of development work in the last few years, and is getting ready to ship some ore that he believes will pay him for all the time and trouble he has been to. The rock looks mighty good at the 70-foot level, and it is getting better as he goes down. Recent assays of ore from this prospect made Mr. Cole smile blandly, but he is making no claims until he gets a car of the rock to the smelter.

Farm Products.
While the search for gold and other precious metals that may be found in the hills and gravel beds of the territory about Myrtle Creek is granted to be an alluring occupation, those men and women who are staying by the farms and orchards are reaping the results of their toil, and the golden returns are positively certain. It may be a slower process than sinking the shaft or tunnel or panning the gravel of some creek bed for "color," but bank accounts appear to grow

High School Building at Myrtle Creek.

A box factory capable of supplying the fruit growers of the district is another growing industry at Myrtle Creek, and this enterprise is a great convenience to the horticulturists there, as they can get supplies without unnecessary delays during the busy packing season.

Fine Schools.

Myrtle Creek boasts of excellent schools, and four teachers are employed in the high school grades and three in the other departments. The school building is in the heart of the city, but hardly adapted to public needs, it is surrounded by fine old trees that afford a delightful retreat alike to students and townspeople. Bonds have been voted for new buildings in order to keep pace with the growth of the town.

The big industry of the town is the prune business. Warehouses receive the fruit as it comes from the driers, and it is then shipped to the packing plants for processing before being packed for shipment to the east, or perhaps the old world. Some of the finest orchards in Douglas county, and perhaps some of the oldest ones, are found close to Myrtle Creek. In addition to these producing orchards, a large acreage of young trees are rapidly coming to the revenue-yielding age, and these will soon largely increase the tonnage shipped annually from the town.

Town Is Growing.

That the town is growing is attested by the fact that there are no empty residences, nor is there a single vacant business place. A new store or two are among the enterprises opening up in town very recently. The city owns its own water system, but the present plant is inadequate for the needs of the people. To meet this situation a new cement pipe-line is being laid from the springs on Red Mountain, the source of the water supply, so that within a short time that scarcity will be overcome. The electric lighting system is also owned by the municipality. The main street is traversed by the Pacific highway, and paving op-garages are necessary to care for this business. These establishments are conducted by H. M. Shirliff, Madrox & Abbott, and Weaver & Valentine. The town supports a newsstand, bakery and lunch room, a blacksmith shop, pool rooms and cigar store, and a good two-chair barber shop. The main mercantile houses are Rice Bros. & Adams, general merchandise; B. A. Humaker, groceries; Chapin Furniture company; Dement Hardware company; a splendid drug store, R. W. Reynolds, proprietor; and the Selig Cash store, carrying a line of general merchandise. There are two good hotels, one of them a two-story brick. Most of the business houses are of brick or cement, generally two stories high. The town is served by a strong bank, incorporated as the Citizens State Bank, G. R. Bates, cashier.

Plenty of Big Game.

In the mountain districts east and west of Myrtle Creek is found all sorts of big game during the open season, and many sportsmen, from Portland, as well as from California points, come annually to enjoy the fine hunting in that locality.

Quartz Mining.

In the territory adjacent to Myrtle Creek is found large deposits of quartz which carries gold, silver, and copper. A good deal of development work has been done in some localities, and two or three of the properties have about reached the shipping point in their operations. Little has been said regarding these properties, but that they are real factors in the industrial life of the community cannot be denied. The Continental mine, 12 miles from Myrtle Creek, owned by W. C. Bates, who is operating the property, has already made an initial shipment of 18 tons of ore which netted him $2200. Some of the ore from this mine runs as high as $600 to the ton in gold, silver and copper.

Another prospect, the Little Chieftan, in the same vicinity as the Continental, is operated by Mr. Pratt under lease, and he is taking out considerable ore that runs heavily in gold and silver, with some copper.

under more frequent deposits as coin comes in for crops or livestock. According to reliable estimates made at the local bank in 1921 Myrtle Creek prunes growers sold $150,000 worth of dried fruit. Apple growers, in the same year, were paid $75,000 for the commercial varieties shipped from that section. Mohair and wool shipped through the local station brought the owners $10,000. There were $7,000 worth of Thanksgiving and Christmas turkeys shipped out of town, and approximately $25,000 worth of eggs, and a nice little sum received for chickens. Shipments of livestock, cattle, sheep and hogs totaled something like $15,000. There was no estimate on the worth of the lumber shipped during the year, nor on the cherries and other fruits of a perishable nature that were sent to the city markets.

These figures do not cover all the products raised by the Myrtle Creek growers, and it is safe to say that many thousands of dollars' worth of products sold by the people of the locality of which no record is available. But Myrtle Creek is growing, and her people contribute largely to the progress and prosperity of Douglas county and the state. The citizenry there is largely American-born and the town has the usual local representation, the I. O. O. F., Masons and W. O. W. being the principal orders, the ladies' auxiliaries to them being in evidence. The churches in Myrtle Creek are Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist and Christian.

BRIDE STOLEN FROM WEDDING BY BROTHER

(International News Service.)
VANCOUVER, Wash., July 3.—With ring, marriage license and sweetheart, Richard W. Field appeared before the Rev. A. D. Shanks here.

When Field later left the parsonage he still had the ring and the marriage license—and a black eye—but no bride.

The groom-to-be was in the very act of placing the ring on the finger of Miss Virginia Griffin when the latter's brother rushed into the room, shouting:

"This marriage shall go no further!"
The brother ordered his sister's lover to "come outside." Field did so and received a wallop in the eye. Then the brother's friend appeared with an automobile, and the two men dragged the near-bride into the machine and sped away.
Field was left standing on the porch, holding a ring in one hand and a marriage license in the other, and it was only with one eye that he could follow the rapid disappearance of his sweetheart. He was unable to explain the brother's objections to the marriage, which the latter succeeded in preventing by a matter of a couple of seconds.
