Love's Masquerade

A Dramatic Story of Love and Romance
By Idah McGlone Gibson

Clavering continued: "Did the doctors say that I would really get well, or will they send me somewhere to just hibernate the rest of my life?"

"They said, Harry, that you would probably have to fight tuberculosis the rest of your days, for that shot to your already weakened lungs would put you in line for the dread disease at any time."

"I'd rather die, Jim, he remarked earnestly. Then after another short silence, he asked: 'Has anyone seen Doris? What does she think about it? She probably thinks I am getting the punishment I deserve.'"

"On the contrary, Harry, she said nothing of the kind and she has already withdrawn her petition for divorce. As soon as she read the account of the shooting she wanted to come to you immediately. We had all we could do to keep her away from here."

"Why did you try to keep her away, Jim? Why didn't you let her come?"

"Because, in your delirium, you kept calling on Margaret Earle to come."

"A faint smile curled Harry's lips. 'A man usually tells what is in his heart when he is drunk or delirious,' he remarked. 'I wish Margaret could have heard me.'"

"You probably thought, Jim," he continued, "that another woman would be more than Doris could stand. Perhaps it would have been. Old man, I can't tell you how I feel about your kindness to me. You have been much better to me than I deserve, Jim, but, honestly, I shall think I have been a bigger fool than a sinner. I would gladly have taken the shot that killed Claire Adams rather than the one I got."

"All my life I have been like the drunkard who knows that drink is taking from him all that makes life worth living, and yet cannot resist tasting the cup that is held to his lips."

"I expect that the newspapers have had a fine time with me, Jim. Did they show me up beautifully?"

"Well, I must admit, Harry, that you have been making splendid copy and headlines during the last few days."

"Harry turned his face to the wall with a groan, and I went over to Milt's room."

"I think, Jim," Milt exclaimed as he put down a number of clippings which the nurse had evidently cut from the papers, "that I will cable Margaret. It is more than probable that some of the London papers will get some of this, and I would hate to have her worry."

"I told Milt I had cabled Margaret and showed him a copy of the message. He seemed pleased and made almost the same remarks to me that Harry had about being in my debt. He also said he was glad that I had cabled nothing about Glendening. Then I told him that Harry had come out of his delirium. Consequently there would be no danger of his speaking Margaret's name when he should not."

"I also explained to Milt that I had arranged for the burial of his wife tomorrow."

"Thank you so much, Jim. May I ask you one more favor? See that I have the proper people and vehicle to take me to the services and to the grave."

"Are you sure you have the strength to go, Milt? We brought you over here in an ambulance and wheeled you into Glendening's room on a hospital rolling bed."

"Oh, I'll be able to go all right. You know I'll go if I have to be taken to the cemetery in the same way I was brought here."

"I did not remonstrate with him for I knew that I would probably do the same thing under the same circumstances."

"Milt obeys his code of ethics to the letter. I knew exactly what was in his mind. He was saying to himself that if he could stand the excruciating pain necessary to go to Harry Glendening—a perfect stranger, and a man he did not like—in order to keep Margaret Earle's name from being connected with the Glendening scandal, he certainly would not try to save himself with any excuse of physical inability from attending his wife to the end of her last journey."

"Milt is a character of strange contradictions, isn't he, Jim?" said Davis. "He always seems to be afraid of the speech of people; he has always given his wife the very best care, and he always seems to take himself to task for falling in love with Margaret Earle. Indeed, I think he has always denied that he was in love with her until the night of the fire. And now he seems to think that what has come to him is in some way a punishment for what he said to us on that night."

"I do not think that Milt fell in love with Margaret, John," returned Clavering seriously. "I think what he feels for Margaret has been of slow growth."

HERBERT RAWLINSON AT ANTLERS TONIGHT

The athletic prowess of Herbert Rawlinson stands him in good stead in his latest Universal production, "The Black Dog," now showing at the Antlers theater. Rawlinson was endowed by nature with a superb physique. He draws heavily upon his agility and his drawn in this picture. After two rough-and-tumble fights with a dangerous criminal, he leaps from the second-story window of a hotel and pursues the man's yacht in a fast motor boat. There is another battle with a husky deck-hand when Rawlinson overtakes the fleeing craft.

"The Black Dog," based on Louis Joseph Vance's novel and directed by Stuart Patton, is replete with thrills, mystery and swiftly-moving action.

"FALL OF BABYLON" TO BE SHOWN HERE

D. W. Griffith's "The Fall of Babylon," produced on an even more elaborate scale than "The Birth of a Nation," and "Hearts of the World," comes to the Liberty theater Tuesday and Wednesday, July 11 and 12.

Some idea of the startling magnitude of this latest of the Griffith super-pictures may be gained from the statement that it cost more than $650,000 to produce, is presented by a company totaling 125,000 men and women, and has 7500 horses taking part in the great chariot races and pageants attending the Feast of Belshazzar. The great walls of Babylon, with their giant height of 300 feet and the spacious boulevards built upon their tops; the wonderful halls in the Temple of Belshazzar, halls a mile in length, with giant elephants of alabaster rising up along their sides; the vari-colored lights that play and glow upon the fountains of perfume and wine; the dancing girls, the high priestesses, and all the mighty splendor and luxury of those ancient days—these are but the outstanding features of Griffith's "The Fall of Babylon."

Report Shows Good Work Done

The chamber of commerce report for the months of May and June show considerable work achieved. There were over 500 letters received and over 600 mailed. There were more than 1,200 people using the office, of which number 70 per cent were tourists seeking road information. Ten per cent were prospective settlers seeking information regarding the Umpqua valley and looking for a location. Between seven and eight hundred road maps were given out, ten business meetings held, six forum luncheons given. Several outside organizations and committees used the rooms for meetings. Over twenty-five new members have been secured.

should not be neglected. They form the supporting structure upon which the dental arch is built and should be kept in the mouth until they are forced out by the permanent teeth.

The science of dentistry has so improved during the last century that if a dentist was consulted soon enough in childhood a person's teeth could be protected and kept whole during the course of their life. If tooth structure is completely broken down it can be restored to its former efficiency.
