Love's Masquerade A Dramatic Story of Love and Romance by Idaho McElone Gibson

GLENDENING WIRES

"Why do you say you are not sure, Jim? Margaret said she was anxious to get over to see Milt, didn't she?"

"Yes, but she asked me very minutely all about Harry. She is a very clever woman, Dave. If I had not known the inside of all this story, I would have thought that she was more of a friend of Doris than of Harry, and only an old friend of Milt's. Strange how some women can cover up their hearts."

"It is easier to do it over the phone, Jim. Perhaps if you had been near her and seen her you could have judged. What shall we do now?"

"Well, for one thing I am going up to the hospital and tell Harry that his wife has had a long talk with Margaret over the phone and that if he wants to know about Margaret he had better see Doris and find out. I am growing very tired of all these subtleties. The thing is now on the knees of the Gods. The hour of 12 is struck. Love will have to drop his mask and you and I will step out of the picture as gracefully as possible."

"Are you going to tell Harry about Milt?"

"No, of course not."

"Are you going to tell Milt about the telephone message?"

"Yes, I think I had better do so unless the doctors think that he is not able to stand any excitement."

"Well, I am on my way to Doris. I will probably hear the entire conversation she had with Margaret."

"That will be interesting. Perhaps she will be so engrossed in it that she will not think to ask you about visiting Harry."

"Not a chance in the world. Doris has got a big part to play and she is standing at the wing waiting for her cue." Davis called back as he entered his car.

"I have heard from Margaret, John," Doris greeted Davis as he arrived at her home. "And I never knew before how sweet she was. She told me that she had read something of Harry's trouble abroad and that she had been so sorry both for him and for me."

"Did she say that she came home on that account?" asked Davis quickly.

"I didn't ask her why she came home so suddenly, but there has always been a deep friendship between Margaret and me, and possibly she did. I am awfully anxious to get to Harry. I want to tell him how sweet Margaret was, how she hoped that he was going to get well right away and how she sent her kindest regards to him."

Davis groaned inwardly. "Did you tell her that you had withdrawn your petition for divorce?"

"She would have known that I would do that."

"What did she say when you told her that you were going to forgive him?"

"She didn't say anything but I could feel the vibrations of her sympathy and approval over the wire."

"What about all these other affairs that have come between?"

"Great Scott! Are you flesh and blood or just stuff? Don't you know that a man can love a woman devotedly, but never singly. He can cherish her in his heart, her image can be behind his eyes, although his tongue frames pretty lies to some other women."

"What about that 'one-woman's man' we read so much about?"

"I've never seen one," returned Harry wearily. "There may be such a thing but not that I know of. Take a wire, Jim, for me to Margaret."

"Am only living in hopes of seeing you. Let me garbled accounts of recent episode influence you. With all my soul I implore you to come immediately and get the whole truth from me."

Tomorrow—George Milton's Disappointment.

"Is she coming over?"

Doris wrinkled up her nose in an effort to decide. "Do you know, John, I really am not sure whether she is coming or not right away. You see she spoke to me so sympathetically and was so sweet about it all, and we talked so long, that at the last whether she would come or not, was rather vague. But of course she will come, she knows I need her."

"And now I am going to see Harry, am I not?"

"The doctors say that you can see him in the morning." Davis swallowed a lump in his throat as he said this, for he determined that notwithstanding any objections Harry might offer, he was not going to worry himself into an early grave trying to invent more excuses to give Doris.

"Oh, I wish I could have seen him today! I know he will be interested in hearing what Margaret said to me. It certainly might cheer him up to know that she fully approves of my forgiving him and taking him back. I have decided, John, that while it may be necessary for us to go south for a little time, that as soon as Harry recovers his health, we will go to New York. It ought not be hard for Harry to get a position as editor, either on a magazine or in a publishing house."

"Poor Harry! She has got it all marked out for him," Davis said to himself. "And he is probably lying in that hospital hoping to hear from Margaret every time the telephone rings, unless Glavening has already told him of the conversation."

Clavering had told Harry, "Good Heavens, Jim," snapped Glendenning petulantly, "will Doris always ball things up for me. What do you suppose Margaret thought when Doris phoned her?"

"Well, for one thing, Harry, she must know now that there hasn't been the slightest suspicion in Doris' mind that you have made love to Margaret Earle."

"Why, I haven't made love to her, damn it, man, can't you see that I am in love with her, have always been in love with her? I was in love with her before I knew her. I expect to be in love with her after I am dead."

"What about all these other affairs that have come between?"

"Great Scott! Are you flesh and blood or just stuff? Don't you know that a man can love a woman devotedly, but never singly. He can cherish her in his heart, her image can be behind his eyes, although his tongue frames pretty lies to some other women."

"What about that 'one-woman's man' we read so much about?"

"I've never seen one," returned Harry wearily. "There may be such a thing but not that I know of. Take a wire, Jim, for me to Margaret."

"Am only living in hopes of seeing you. Let me garbled accounts of recent episode influence you. With all my soul I implore you to come immediately and get the whole truth from me."

Returns From the Presbyterian Synod

Local Presbyterians and all young people of the vicinity will be interested in the fact that the Presbyterian synod of Oregon has dedicated a building at the edge of the campus of the Oregon Agricultural college at Corvallis to house the work of the student pastor," said the Rev. Mr. Quick, of this city, who has just returned from the annual meeting of Oregon Synod at Corvallis, July 10 to 14.

Synod is the largest gathering of Presbyterians during the year and adopts policies for the Presbyterian churches of the state.

The house for the student pastor has been fully paid for and has been in use much of the past year. Among other activities was the Thanksgiving dinner for more than 200 students who could not go home. Also a banquet for members of Synod on Wednesday, July 12.

Synod appointed a committee representing all interests involved to study the educational problems of Presbyterians in the state, especially with reference to Albany college. This committee will report next year. Meanwhile the college will continue in operation, although the president, Dr. A. M. Williams, has resigned.

Another change in the organization of the synod which was consummated at Corvallis was the appointment of Rev. D. A. Thompson, a Portland pastor, as synodical superintendent. He takes the place of Rev. Mr. Beaudin Sealey, who becomes church extension secretary of Portland presbytery. Both men have been in the state for many years. Synod established in connection with their office in 101 Third building, Portland, a central receiving agency to which all benevolent money for the boards can be sent and thence distributed to the boards. This is in line with the development of Presbyterian financial efficiency.

The State Agricultural college was host of the synod, President Kerr being a Presbyterian elder. He gave the synod and the corresponding women's organization a dinner in the home economics building Wednesday evening. The school and the synod joined in a series of lectures each day at 11 o'clock.

During the noon hour each day the members of the synod divided into four conference groups to consider foreign missions, church publicity, men's work and religious education, under the direction of men from the east, representing the boards of the church.

Among the better-known speakers present were Dr. C. C. Hays, of Johnstown, Pennsylvania, moderator of general assembly; Dr. Joseph A. Vance, of Detroit, Michigan; Dr. Charles H. McDonald and Dr. P. E. Stockwell, of New York, and Rev. A. F. McGarrath, who lectured on stewardship, a subject which will engage the attention of every Presbyterian church during the coming year.

Report of the New Era committee brought out the fact, characterized as "shameful" by the chairman, the Rev. W. W. MacHenry, of Portland, that Presbyterians in Oregon last year gave an average of less than 6 cents a week to support all the mission and educational enterprises of the denomination. This was less than half the average given by the 1,735,200 members of the denomination. The growth in membership, however, was twice as rapid as the growth of the entire denomination.

Rev. B. P. Harper, Sunday school missionary in Pendleton county, was moderator.

Synod next year will meet in Eugene.
