What Happened When Sheila Elliston Refused Love

By Idah McGlone Gibson

MRS. WILMINGTON

It is not while beauty and youth are thine own,
And thy cheeks unprofaned by a tear,
That the fervor and faith of a soul
can be known,
To which Time will but make thee
more dear.

No, the heart that has truly loved
never forgets,
But as surely loves on to the close,
As the sunflower loves to her God,
when he sets,
The same look that she turned when he rose.

—Thomas Moore.

I dropped the book of poems beside me on the bed and pondered the lines of the poet:

"The heart that has truly loved
never forgets—"

Was it true? I wondered. My musing was interrupted by my nurse entering with a package. I sat up.

"Is it another present?" I asked eagerly. "My friends have been so lovely to me since I have been ill, Miss Elliston."

"It is a war picture of your brother," my pretty nurse announced as she took off the paper and lifted a silver-framed photograph from its box and placed it on the table beside my bed.

"That is better than any gift a friend could possibly send me," I murmured.

"You are right, Mrs. Elliston," I looked up at Miss Elliston in surprise, for it was the first time since she had been with me that she had made the slightest comment of a personal nature about any of my belongings.

Until this moment I had not been aware that she had taken the least interest in any of my monologues of praise about my only brother—to me the kindest and best man in all the world.

I took the photograph into my hands and gazed at it with adoring eyes.

"Yes, that is his war picture. Isn't it wonderful, Miss Elliston? I found it in my strong box you put upon my bed the other day when I was hunting for those papers my lawyer wanted. I sent it by Marie to have it framed."

"This is a priceless thing to me. It is an official French government photograph taken at the moment Marshal Foch, himself, was pinning the Croix de Guerre with two palms on my brother's coat. Isn't he one of the handsomest men you have ever seen?"

I raised my eyes in smiling question to the face of my white-capped nurse.

Her lips wore the fleeting ghostly smile that I occasionally saw upon them. It mystified me. I couldn't fathom the thought that lay behind the smile.

She took the picture from my hands and looked at it closely for a moment, then she gave my brother the compliment that I like best:

"He is more than good-looking, Mrs. Elliston, he looks good."

There was a timber, a quality in her voice as she said this that I could not account for. Then as though she had spoken more than she had intended she asked in a matter-of-fact tone:

"Where shall I put the photograph, Mrs. Elliston, on your dressing table here in your bedroom or out on the stand in the morning room?"

"We'll have it right here beside my bed until I go into the other room, Miss Elliston. I want him near me. It isn't every woman who has a brother like mine. He was decorated for his work in the air by the French at Verdun, the English in Flanders, and the Americans at Chateau Thierry—and he is scarcely 26 now."

I stopped abruptly as I always did when I caught that queer look in the lovely eyes of my nurse. Her face has a strange expression. She was pitying me, I thought, that I should love and trust any man as I did my brother.

Again I wondered, as I had many times, what terrible thing some man had done to her that made that look come over her face whenever I mentioned any man as being worthy of the supreme regard of a woman. I was curious about her. I wondered if I could draw out her story. I decided to try.

"The only fault I have to find in my brother Phil, Miss Elliston," I went on in a calmer tone, "is that he has stayed away from me, his only sister, too long. He has not been back since the war ended."

"He wrote months ago that there were still some great engineering problems to be solved in Russia—if that country ever got back on a stable basis—and he wanted to be on the ground at the time."

"He gave up his career as an engineer to enlist. After the armistice was signed he worked with the food relief commission. I rather expect he is helping to feed any hungry baby he comes across now, for Phil has always had an open hand, and heart where children were concerned. However, I am sure that had he received my letter telling him of that silly little accident where I stepped on a pebble and in falling, broke my leg, he would have come home to me immediately. He must have gone into Russia before the letter arrived in Paris. I wouldn't be surprised if he turned up here any day now."

I hesitated a little expectantly but my beautiful nurse said nothing.

Somewhat plumped that I could not interest her in my story I ventured nothing more.

"The doctor said you might be moved into the other room today," from her voice and her manner one would have thought that I had not been speaking at all, or that she was concerned in nothing but my physical care.

"You remember he is going to take the cast off your leg this morning," she continued.

Without waiting for any acquiescence she proceeded to get me into a negligee which meant that I was to be partially dressed for the first time in two months.

"I don't think I will go out there just yet," I said petulantly. I could not find fault with my nurse for she was efficiency itself, but oh, how I wished she would be a little bit of something more than a trained nurse. I wanted someone about me who would be interested in the real me. I wanted to like her if she would let me, and yet she always held me at arm's length. I could never get behind the mysterious sadness which made me always think that I saw her violet eyes through a veil of tears. What was her story? I wanted very much to know.

Tomorrow—Sheila Elliston.

MALE DRESS REFORM IS ON THROUGHOUT LONDON

(International News Service.)
LONDON, July 25.—A male dress reform is in full swing in London.

Sticklers for correct dress are now striving to displace dinner jackets for evening wear and insist upon males appearing at evening functions in full evening dress.

What with the Londoner's predilection for silk-hatted, business attire, and frock-coated afternoon attire, and correct river dress, and grey topper racing garb, and "plus four" rolling outfits, it looks like dire days for those who haven't a wardrobe.

American male visitors to London, however, are shaking the natives and demonstrating their freedom from the slavery of clothes by wearing "civilized" garments.

Medford Field Gets No Plane

Owing to the fact that no forest patrol planes have landed here since they passed through going north two or three weeks ago, says the Mail-Tribune, this office wrote Capt. Lowell H. Smith, asking if any planes were to be stationed here, and if not would this be a landing base, and if one of the three radio stations they were to establish in the state would be put in at Medford. This is his reply:

"There will be no planes permanently stationed in Medford, nor will a radio control station be established there, during the present forest patrol season."

"This year we are patrolling state forest principally, and only go over national forests during a fire crisis. We intend to use the Medford field for the purpose of taking state foresters stationed at Medford over their territory whenever desired. This, however will be delayed somewhat pending the conditioning of the Medford landing field. At present it may be necessary for the Medford forester to go to Roseburg or Grants Pass to meet patrol planes."

"Our radio stations will be established in Salem, Eugene and Roseburg. These three stations will receive messages from planes over any part of the state forests."

CITIZEN WANTS POLICE TO GET FORTUNE TELLER

(International News Service.)
AKRON, Ohio, July 25.—A suggestion that a fortune teller be placed on the payroll of the city detective department here has been made to Chief of Detectives Harry Welch.

"I had my fortune told last night by Oles," reads a letter received by Chief Welch from H. M. Beatty, No. 1188 Manchester road. "He says there were two men drove my car away—one tall, thin, light-haired, with cheeks sunken, the other short, dark-haired, sharp-nosed. They drove toward the east, turned off on Mogadore road and went to Sharon, Pa. They did not change the license number. Now I want you to find out about it."

Nearly Million in Unpaid Taxes

EUGENE, July 24.—Lane county has assets of more than $800,000 in the shape of unpaid and uncollected taxes on the rolls, including the forest fire patrol tax, according to the semi-annual report of Sheriff Stickle. He estimates that of this sum about $10,000 can never be collected.

BALL GAME TONIGHT.

A rather interesting game of baseball is expected tonight when the team representing the Columbia Park Boys' Club of San Francisco, meets the city team at Laurelwood Park. Although the boys are quite young they have a team which has met with only one defeat since leaving San Francisco. They are exceptionally good ball players and the local team can expect a good contest. The game will start about 5:30 p. m.
