What Happened When Sheila Elliston Refused Love

By Idah McGlone Gibson

SUSANNE JONES

My brother, Phil, in some respects, has a one-track mind. As I spoke of Walter Jones, Phil's mind started off on a tangent which took it very far from either Sheila or me.

"Walter Jones!" he exclaimed. "I've heard a lot about him lately. He is the father of Susanne Jones. I remember hearing her talk about him. She was a canon in France. I saw a great deal of her. She is still helping Ann Morgan in the rehabilitation of French towns."

"Susanne was always talking of her father and telling how splendid he was to give her money to carry out her plans abroad. It seems he was much disappointed that her only brother was not able to join the army. I believe it was ineptly tuberculosis. Beside that I gathered from her that the young man had greatly disappointed his father in other ways and that she was trying to make up for it."

"This time I could make no mistake. As Phil discussed the Jones's, Sheila became paler and paler. Finally even Phil noticed it.

"What's the matter, Miss Elliston, are you ill?" he asked. She gathered herself together with an effort, and answered, "It seemed rather warm for the moment. I think that is all."

"Would you mind, Mrs. Wilmington, if I went out on the veranda?" Her voice was tremblingly weak. "Oh, let me take you," Phil jumped up quickly.

"No, please don't let me disturb you. I can go alone."

In spite of her remonstrance, Phil pushed back her chair and accompanied her to the door of the open terrace. After some minutes he returned alone.

"What is the matter, Phil? Doesn't Miss Elliston feel well enough to come back?"

"I made her think so at any rate," said Phil. "I do not think she realized the shock of her near accident this afternoon. She seemed to think that she ought to do something for you later, but I told her that you would call her if your leg pained you, and I was sure that you would be glad if she would take a rest."

"Kay, isn't it just wonderful that I found her? Fate is a lovely old lady, after all, isn't she?"

He came around the table and enthusiastically kissed me. I wondered if he was using me to kiss Sheila vicariously. I was a bit jealous.

"Do you know, Kay, I had all I could do to keep from taking her in my arms—she looked so white and kind of pitiful when she raised her eyes to mine. I don't believe I can stay very long in this house with her without telling her I love her."

"Nonsense, Phil, don't be a goose. If you speak too soon you may frighten her."

Long into the night Phil and I talked, but on whatever subject we started, it was always ended by Phil bringing the conversation round to Sheila.

He did, however, tell me a good deal about Susanne Jones.

"Do you know, Kay," he said, "I am almost certain that had I never found Sheila I should have asked Susanne to marry me. It is time I settled down and married—at least something about Susanne made me think so. One of the things I intended to tell you when I first arrived here was that possibly in the near future I should introduce her to you as your sister-in-law."

"Susanne is a splendid woman, Kay. Some people may think she is rather haughty, but when you know her she is very sweet and sympathetic. But after I had seen Sheila I knew that the emotion I felt for Susanne was only friendship."

"In a little while, Phil, you will make me believe in love at first sight."

"Why shouldn't you? It's the only kind of love there is. I remember Blake told me he fell in love with you when he looked into your eyes across the dinner table and he didn't even know your name."

"I have been remembering that all the time that you have been rhapsodizing about Sheila, Phil dear, for Blake insisted that the moment his eyes met mine he loved me quite as much as he did ever after."

"Blake was right, Kay. I have never believed in a slow realization of the beauty and worth of a girl."

"And yet your adoration for Miss Jones was of slow growth, Phil, was it not?"

"Yes," was Phil's hesitating reply. "I really don't know when I thought of her as a wife, but it was a long time after I had known her. And even then in my heart I had a feeling that I must be taken by storm."

"Well, this seems to be a perfectly good whiff that you are encouraging now," I commented as I bade him good night.
