What Happened When Sheila Elliston Refused Love

By Idah McGlone Gibson

SHEILA'S STORY

Much as I admired and loved Sheila, I had up to this time had a twinge of jealousy when I thought of her as Phil's wife. But now, when I had the slightest intimation that she might be supplanted by Susanne Jones, I was heart and mind and soul for Sheila.

"I know I would not like Miss Jones," I said to myself as I remembered what an unattractive little girl she was years ago when she came from the private school to be with her people who lived near us when we were very small children.

But for all that I could not be as sure as was Phil, that Susanne did not expect in her heart of hearts to be his wife.

I remembered very well my Bernard Shaw who, I was sure, struck the nail upon the head when in "Man and Super-man" he made the hero absolutely clay in the hands of the clever heroine who had made up her mind to marry him.

"Phil will have a hard time dodging," I said to myself, "if Susanne Jones has made up her mind to be Mrs. Spencer. If I remember rightly, even as a small child she had all the stubbornness, decision, energy and despotism of her father."

I heard the rattle of the motor car and knew that Sheila was coming back. As I looked out the window my heart went out to the girl who was plainly to be seen sitting all crumpled up in my town car.

She did not look in any way like a girl who had lunched and had been flattered by a most eligible bachelor. Instead, she looked most forlorn and unhappy.

I determined that when she came upstairs I would take her right to my heart and make her smile again by telling her that not only Phil loved her, but I loved her, too.

I knew, as I saw her, that she really was the girl I wanted Phil to marry. But when Sheila came into my sitting room my plans took wing.

I found it impossible for me to tell her anything of a personal nature. Although she showed none of the despondency that I saw in the pathetic droop of her figure in the motor when she thought no one was observing her, she had most effectively drawn between herself and the world that "frost-like barrier" of which Phil had spoken.

Before I could speak, Sheila said: "Mrs. Wilmington, I must tell you that I cannot stay with you. I have just seen Dr. Thornton and had a long talk with him. He has made me understand not only how foolish it would be to give up my profession of nursing at this time after I had spent so many years learning it, but he told me that nursing was the only way in which he felt I could pay my real debt"—there was a slight hesitancy in her voice, and then she repeated, "in which I could pay my real debt to humanity."

"He said I would be labeling myself a coward if I gave up the work of caring for the sick and unhappy for a life of luxury and pleasure which you are offering me."

"Please, please, Mrs. Wilmington," she hurried on as I was about to speak, "do not think that I am ungrateful. I love you more than you will ever know. You have shown me a kind of friendship and a life that I had despaired ever of knowing—a life that I had desired with a longing that would not be still. I have always wanted a friend like you."

"But even if I go back, you will not take your friendship from me, will you?"

"Not waiting for me to answer, she plunged on: "You know, of course, that both my mother and father were gentle folk and before that horrible crash in business—the anxiety of which killed my father whose death was followed by that of my dear mother in a few weeks—I have lived in a comfortable home."

"Of course I never had all the money that you may spend so lavishly, but there was enough—yes, more than enough, for all my girlish wants and ample to send me away to school."

"Alas, like many other girls of dotting parents I was not trained for any one thing. When the eclatancy threatened I found I knew nothing of the world and how to fight my way. Your friend, Mrs. Walton, had been a friend of my mother's when they were girls. Learning of my friendless condition she took me into her home until I could decide, with her help, what would be best for me. Soon after I went to her she was taken ill, and she seemed to think, by the way I fitted into her sick room, that I was a born nurse. As soon as she was well enough she recommended me to the faculty of the Good Samaritan hospital, and I took the four-year course."

"I stayed there all through the war, although I never wanted anything so much in my life as I wanted to go over, but my going did not seem expedient to Mrs. Walton and Dr. Thornton."

A queer kind of flush almost tinged her cheek with purple. I wonder if it was caused by the sudden bursting of Phil in the room or whether there were some sadder thoughts behind the story she was telling me.

Movie Closeups

GEORGE ARLISS PORTRAYS CRAZY SOCIETY DEVIL. "The Devil" of Mr. George Arliss, at the Liberty theater is not the sphincter devil of the horns and spiked tail. His particular devil is a polished, well-bred gentleman who, in the guise of a "friend," finds in love a mighty weapon with which to destroy the goodness of human beings who are trying to do what the world calls right.

Mr. Arliss, it will be remembered, created "The Devil" on the speaking stage and, by the subtlety and polish of his performance, won the praise of the critics of the country, and the public. His screen interpretation is no less poignant and finished, while the production itself, by virtue of its artistry of settings, photography, lighting, direction and acting, reaches a peak of photodramatic art, and has been acclaimed one of the great pictures. It will be shown Tuesday and Wednesday at the Liberty theater.

VULGARITY NOT WANTED IN HAROLD LLOYD FILMS

Vulgar is a word that has never been applied to the comedies of Harold Lloyd, the newest of which, "Now or Never," is to be at the Liberty theater Tuesday and Wednesday. This is indeed a distinction and a deserved one.

Harold Lloyd believes it is not necessary to be vulgar to be funny. In fact, he does not see fun in vulgarity, and, furthermore, he believes there are enough people in the world who think the same to warrant making clean comedies.

That his faith in the wholesome tastes of the public is justified is proven by his marvellous rise to the top of a ladder where the going was not only steep, but crowded. After little more than a year of special two-reel comedy features, Harold Lloyd is recognized as the screen's cleverest and most talented comedian.

"Now or Never" is Harold Lloyd's first comedy with Associated Exhibitors. As usual, he is supported by beautiful Mildred Davis. A new assistant is four-year-old Anna May Wilson, a child for whom a great future is predicted.
