WORTHLESS MULE EATS HEAD OFF; FARMER IS STUNG FOR HIS BOARD

(International News Service.)

BEAVER, Pa., Aug 25.—When is a worthless mule worth $200?

This paradoxical question has been answered in the courts of Beaver County by Judge Frank E. Reader.

A Beaver Falls negro tried to give the mule to a friend, who later decided he would not accept. He could not return him, so turned the mule loose. The mule finally landed in C. L. Householder's barn. The hungry democratic problem ate up $196 worth of feed while Householder was trying to palm him off on an unappreciative borough and the humane society was nagging at him. He managed to get rid of him somehow, and then presented the bill to the borough for maintenance.

Judge Reader said Householder was stung.

WOMAN LIKED CAMPAIGN CARD PHOTO; CANDIDATE GETS "IN BAD" AT HOME

(International News Service.)

BELLAIRE, Ohio, Aug 25.—Promise that "never again" will he use campaign cards has been made by one of the candidates here who took part in Ohio's statewide primaries this month.

In an inland town he distributed cards to several women.

One woman was so well pleased with his picture that she wrote him a sugary letter. When he did not reply she came here and endeavored to see him.

Result: Domestic difficulties that almost disgusted one member of his family with politics, he said.

THE FARMER'S DOLLAR WORTH 70 CENTS

In the last few days the East Oregonian has made diligent inquiry as to how much money wheat farmers of Umatilla county will make this year. One banker says that the majority of farmers will actually lose money on a basis of present wheat prices. Another declares they will make little if any profit, while a third banker takes the view that careful farmers who have held expenses down closely will make small profits. He gives illustrations to show that in some cases, at least, this will be true.

Yet many farmers have sold wheat at $1 a bushel or thereabout. In prewar days that would have been considered a splendid price. So would 90 cents have been so considered. Why, then, is not wheat-growing profitable at present prices.

There is but one answer. The dollar the farmer gets is not worth enough. Otherwise all would be lovely. The facts are, that the price of wheat has been deflated, but the farmer's living costs have not been deflated proportionately. According to the Department of Agriculture the farmer's dollar is worth 72 cents and its value is falling. There seems to be no escape from this conclusion and also from the conclusion that the buying power of agriculture cannot be restored until a greater equilibrium is provided. Since the west is primarily an agricultural country, business revival will have to be slow under such conditions. No amount of optimism can make good times when a farmer cannot make good profit on $1 wheat.—East Oregonian.

THE HIGH COST OF PUBLIC SERVICE

President Harding doesn't want a second term. Who can blame him? There is, of course, great honor in the White House, but no happiness. In the last half-century the responsibilities and obligations of the President of the United States have been so increased that the burden is almost too much for any mortal man to bear.

Of course, no man aspiring to high office in a republic should be thin-skinned. He must expect criticism and abuse, hostility and misunderstanding as part of the day's work. He must combine a willingness for personal sacrifice, with a philosophical spirit.

But the ingratitude of republics is proverbial, and in recent years there has been an amazing increase in popular impatience, a growing disposition to expect everything from the president, and blame a president for everything—a total absence of reasonable tolerance and sympathy.—Medford Mail-Tribune.

FRANCE IS "BLUE" OVER EXPENSES OF OLYMPICS

(International News Service.)

Paris, Aug. 25.—France has taken responsibility for the 1924 Olympic games. Now that she has them, what is she going to do with them?

Will the money she has voted be enough to give the world an international athletic contest that is worthy of France and the Olympics of past years?

Will French ingenuity and the love of sports that has had a rebirth in France since the war come to the rescue of a slim pocketbook?

A member of the French Olympic Games committee was interviewed on these subjects by the morning newspaper Excelsior the very day that the law granting the credits for the games was promulgated.

"How is France going to put it over?" was the substance of the question put to him. The amount voted was less than $600,000, with an additional $400,000 guaranteed if the gate receipts failed to reimburse the Racing Club for that sum advanced.

"We are going to work," was the reply of the committee member. "First we must find offices of our own which will not be too costly. Then we must choose our administrative personnel carefully, so that it will not have to be too large.

"The racing club has granted the use of its stadium. We have no fear that entrance receipts will not cover the cost of this. At Antwerp just after the war the receipts equalled a million and a half francs, and there were only seventeen nations in the games. In Paris, with forty-two nations participating and better times approaching, we are confident that we shall go over the top.

"Having the Olympics at Paris will give tourists a wonderful opportunity to include them in their usual continental itinerary — and that should have its reaction on our box office."

OFF THE MAP?

Is there a map of the United States in government offices at Washington and is Oregon on that map?

A long list of removals of government agencies from Portland to Seattle, indicates that so far as bureau chiefs in Washington know, Oregon is alien soil, possibly an uncharted island in the Pacific ocean.

The latest dido is the removal from Portland to Seattle of the supervising office of internal revenue agents. It means that Portland taxpayers and business men will be compelled to go to Seattle to adjust with federal officers matters of federal taxes and other items of business, instead of adjusting them in this city.

The change is defended as a matter of economy to the government. What about economy of trips for the Portland people to Seattle and return?

How is it that this constant transfer of things from Portland northward happens anyway? Who is the colored gentleman in the woodpile?

It is a rotten example of government inefficiency and government injustice.—Oregon Journal.

AFTER NORTHCLIFFE

There is a tendency, after a great man dies, to feel that his niche can never be filled — that something irreplaceable is gone out of life with him.

In a sense this is true, and never more so than in the case of Lord Northcliffe. The late Alfred Harmsworth was a great man. Of unusual honesty and frankness, of unusually deep and keen love for his country, of unusual power in putting his honesty and patriotism into forms actually useful to his nation, he seems, as one surveys his life and times, almost to have stood alone.

But it is the glory of England that its great men have always been succeeded by others equally great. It is the glory of humanity that no age is without its men of power and helpfulness, its men who sacrifice their lives devotedly to the cause of getting their fellow-men a little farther along the road.

Northcliffe's successor is not in sight at the present moment. But somewhere he is living and will come forth into the public eye when the public need demands.—Grants Pass Courier.

What Happened When Sheila Elliston Refused Love

By Idah McGlone Gibson

AN APARTMENT FOR TWO

"I was never happier in my life than when I was fixing up our little apartment. I spent all of my off-duty hours over there and so many of my evenings that Walter pretended to be jealous. I could not keep secret the things that I had purchased for, after I had bought them, I began to be nervous for fear I had spent too much money. But Walter seemed to think I had been very economical. He made me very happy by telling me that he knew we would have the prettiest apartment in town.

"Walter was sweet, Mrs. Wilmington. I do not want you to think he intended to ruin my life, for he did not.

"Of course, I have never been able to explain just what happened during that 24 hours between the time we both left the hospital; he to go to his father's country home, and I to go to the apartment to put on the finishing touches and wait for him.

"Everything in the apartment was finished by 4 o'clock that afternoon. It was beautiful. I sat down at the piano and played for an hour. I had been quite a musician before my mother and father died, and won a number of prizes for piano playing during my four years at school.

"Six o'clock. I had not heard from Walter.

"Seven o'clock! Although Walter had said nothing about 'phoning, I had been sure that he would do so.

"The shadows lengthened on the river and palisades I began to feel lonely and rather nervous. Still I did not have the slightest idea of the awful thing that was in store for me.

"I picked up a paper and ran my eyes idly over its contents. Down in one corner I found a little poem. It was called, 'At Dawn.' Two or three times I read it over and, although at the time I did not know that the lines had printed themselves on my brain, yet afterward in —— Oh, I'll repeat them to you:

"'Beloved, our pathway parts;
The idyll is ended
No thought of broken hearts;
Hearts soon are mended.

"'Hearts mend—but oh, the years
That shall pass, leaving
Sad memories, veiled in tears,
Like gray nuns' grieving.'"

"How long I sat there I do not know. I could not realize that in less than 12 hours I would be 'Mrs. Walter Jones, Jr.' I spoke the name aloud and, as I did so, I gave a little involuntary shudder. Was it prophetic? I did not know. Again doubts of the wisdom of my proceedings during the last few days assailed me.

"The little Italian clock on the mantel chimed out the half-hour. I looked in astonishment and found it was half after midnight! Walter would not telephone at such an hour.

"I undressed and almost tremblingly climbed into bed. But I could not stay there. Someway, it seemed wrong. I couldn't tell why. I got out of bed timidly and slipped on a dressing gown over my nightdress, and drawing a chair up to the window I sat there in the dark gazing at the stars.

"I never shall know whether it was a dream or not, Mrs. Wilmington, but in a little while I heard the noise of a taxi coming hurriedly up the street. It drew up on the other side and two men got out. In a few minutes my telephone rang! I rushed to it!

"I heard Walter's voice, rather muffled, as though he were afraid of being overheard.

"'Sheila,' he said. 'Listen, sweetheart. It is very important and I have little——' The connection was broken! Frantically I tried to get it again! I called up central, Walter's father's house, and the hospital, but I could not get him.

"At Walter's home a sleepy butler said that Mr. Jones had not been there all day. At the hospital they told me he had left. And the telephone operator, when I insisted that someone had been calling me, remarked with maddening indifference, 'No one on your line.' I was furious, but what could I do?

"I grew quite hysterical. I began to laugh! and then I found myself crying as though my heart would break. I do not know whether or not this was all a dream. But if it were reality and I was awake, then I do not know the time I went to sleep. The last thing I remember of my dream or really waking were those same two men standing across from my window watching the house.

"All at once I felt, rather than heard, someone rattling at the door and shouting to me to let them in.

"For a moment, before I was thoroughly awake, I was frozen with fear. Then I realized that it was broad daylight.

"'No one can hurt me in the daytime,' I reassured myself, and I stumbled toward the door."

GERMANS TO PAY WAR DEBT IN GOODS

(International News Service.)

PARIS, Aug. 25.—"Made in Germany" is to become the commonest of common labels in France's devastated areas these days.

Beginning this month, war sufferers in these districts are permitted to order, from German merchants goods equal in value to the damage caused them by the war. The value of the goods is charged up to reparations.

The Chamber of Commerce (French) of Cologne is organizing a service to put war victims in touch with German merchants who must, under the agreement, supply them with the goods ordered. It is feared, according to l'Intransigeant, that tariff enforcement will interfere with the perfect working out of this phase of reparations.

THE MAN WORTH WHILE

Joan Arliss, leading support for Romaine Fielding in "The Man Worth While," is one of the very few artists who can act without acting. Her work in Mr. Fielding's last production is a revelation of sincerity. She plays the part of a timber girl, born and bred deep in the forests of the great Northland. Miss Arliss, in real life, is the daughter of a well-known clergyman. She is a grand opera singer of note, with a magnificent dramatic mezzo-soprano voice, plus youth and beauty.

Romaine Fielding, who plays the part of "The Man Worth While," at the Liberty theater Saturday only, has won two popularity contests, conducted by leading motion picture magazines. Before the war, he was considered the most popular motion picture actor in America.

"SLIDE" NAMED FOR BETTY COMPSON IN "OVER THE BORDER"

Can you negotiate the "Betty Compson slide?"

No, it isn't a new dance offered as a substitute for the present supersyncopated steps. It's just the name of a new skiing course at Truckee, California, discovered and dedicated to the dainty Paramount star by Casson Ferguson and J. Farrell MacDonald, who were members of the Pearhyn Stanlawa company on location at the popular winter-and-summer resort. It is nearly a mile long, and it is said to furnish one of the most thrilling rides to be found in that neighborhood.

The picture for which the trip was made, "Over the Border," features Miss Compson and Tom Moore, with an excellent supporting cast. It was written by Sir Gilbert Parker. It will play at the Antlers theater for the last time tonight. The supporting cast is strong and the situations are highly dramatic.
