What Happened When Sheila Elliston Refused Love

By Idah McGlone Gibson

AN ANONYMOUS LETTER

Synopsis.
Young Mrs. Wilmington was recovering from a broken leg. Her nurse, a beautiful young woman, Sheila Elliston, intrigued her interest tremendously. Mrs. Wilmington suspected an interesting story lay concealed in the life of her nurse. Mrs. Wilmington's brother, Phil, returned unexpectedly from abroad. Phil meets Sheila. It is love at first sight. His sister, Mrs. Wilmington, secretly approves, but cautions Phil that she knows nothing of the girl's past. Mrs. Wilmington learns of an affair her brother had with Susanne Jones, the daughter of a wealthy merchant. Phil denies any engagement with Susanne. Sheila has a heart-to-heart talk with Mrs. Wilmington and told this story: Several years before, early in her career, she had been assigned as nurse to Walter Jones, Jr. They fell in love. They planned marriage as soon as Walter was well. He told Sheila to order the furniture for their apartment at his father's store and charge it to him. Then their apartment would be ready after the wedding. Sheila, with misgivings, did so. Walter's tyrannical father opposed the marriage. He had Sheila arrested for theft of the furniture. The jury found her guilty. She was sentenced to three years' imprisonment. The judge paroled her immediately to a Mrs. Walton for the period of her sentence. After that, Dr. Thornton trained her as a nurse. Phil's sister advises her to marry Phil and to never tell him her past. Sheila agrees. Phil and Sheila depart mysteriously at night in Phil's car. They are married and wonderfully happy.

She put into my hand a letter. I saw, after carefully scrutinizing it that it was addressed to Phil, but the "Mr." was so blotted that it might easily have been taken for "Mrs."
"Kay, I would not open Phil's letters for the world. I think it is one of the worst and smallest things a wife can do, but I thought the letter was addressed to me and after I did open it, it seemed that Fate had given it into my hand."
"What is it, Sheila? What do you mean?"
Like most people I turned the letter over and over in my hand, trying to guess what it contained while I questioned that agonized girl.
"I did not know, I did not know," she wailed. "Oh, Kay, you believe me, don't you? If I had really known that this thing would hang over me as it does, I would never have married Phil."
With a jerk I took the sheet of paper out of the cheap envelope and read:
"I wonder, Mr. Phillip Spencer, if you are aware that the face of the woman you have married is in the Rogues' Gallery of the city prison. Has she told you that she was arrested and found guilty of a crime—that she was only kept from the punishment that she deserved through the efforts of Dr. Thornton and Mrs. Walton of this city?"
"Ask either of those sentimental people to tell you about the woman you have married and you will find that all reasonable people are pretty certain that she has not only broken the sixth commandment but the seventh as well."
"A SYMPATHIZING FRIEND."
I tore the letter vindictively into small fragments.
For the moment I was too angry for words. Then the torrent broke forth. "I have nothing ugly enough to say when I name the anonymous letter-writer. A man—"
"Or woman," tensely interrupted Sheila.
"Sheila, do you think—"
"What else is there for me to think? I am quite sure that I have no enemy in the world that would stab me with such a dastardly thing as this unless it might be—"
"Hush, dear, do not say it. I hate to think that any woman in all the world's happiness—would stab her in the back in the way the writer of this letter has tried to do."
"To whom, except Susanne Jones, dear Kay, would the publication of my disgrace bring any joy?" Sheila's voice held the accents of despair as she tremulously asked the question.
"Certainly I hope that to no one else unless it be to Phil and you, and I of so great importance that my picture in the Rogues' Gallery would make the slightest difference."
"Let me go, dear, let me go! I had better go away before Phil finds this out. I could never look upon his face again. You know it is not right that my picture should be there, do you not? You know that I am innocent of all wrongdoing!"
I could not answer her, neither could I reassure her when she dropped upon her knees, and clasping me convulsively about the waist, said: "Oh, Kay, you will get those pictures, will you not? I did not dream for a moment that they were still there. In fact, I did not know what they were taking them for. I was so terror-stricken at the time that I did not see that they were always to be mute accusation against me."
"But you will get them, Kay. Surely you can get them. You are so powerful. No one will refuse Mrs. Wilmington. You will get them for me, will you not?"
Tomorrow—A Heavy Blow.

The Little Chance Speech of Phil's was made when they were looking over some clippings that I had saved for them from the city papers. It was in reference to the interview with Susanne where she said that it was probable that Phil had not known Sheila long.

"Much she knows about it," remarked Phil contemptuously. "I have known you, Sheila, since the morning stars sang together. All down through the ages I know you and was happy whenever I found you. When I lost you I went wandering through space looking for my other self, and the other day when again I found you my heart sang. Sheila, you are the only woman in all God's universe for me, and I know you better than I know myself. I shall never lose you again."
"Hush, Phil; Kay will think you have gone crazy."
"If that is madness, Sheila," I grinned, "one could wish that more husbands were incurably demented. Marriage seems to cure one of that kind of insanity. Everyone who had ever said or written anything on the subject has declared that wives and husbands have to live with each other for a long time before they really know anything about each other."
It was all very beautiful and altho it made my heart ache as it took me back to those blessed, blessed years with Blake, yet it made me happier than I had been since he and I had parted forever.
For some reason I could see that Sheila did not want to be alone with me and from Phil's manner I was almost sure that he was still in happy ignorance of the tragedy that had clouded his wife's life. At times, when I caught him looking at her when he thought he was not observed, there came such a look of tender pity into his eyes that I was not sure.
One morning Phil went to his office early. He had opened his law books and already was beginning to find work piling upon him. The postman was late and I had gone to my room when Sheila came to me in person and devices. A transmission lock

FEARS GETTING BATHING SUIT DAMP; HE LEAVES IT ASHORE, TAKES SWIM

(International News Service)
NEW YORK, Sept. 12.—(Wrapped only "in swirling thought," Salvatore Colucci, a tailor, took a dip in the briny Atlantic at the Municipal Baths at Coney Island.
He emerged at dusk, but Mrs. Anna Becher viewed the surprising spectacle and called a cop. Colucci was going through a series of calisthenics on the beach when accosted by the officer.
"I didn't want to get my bathing suit wet and carry it back to New York," explained Colucci, who said he had rolled up the bathing garment and left it on the beach while taking his swim.

Movie Closeups

A distinct photoplay novelty is produced in "Frontline," the William Fox super-spectacle which will begin a run at the Antlers theatre tonight. New York reviewers and audiences hailed the production as a notable motion picture achievement.
Those who have read the story of "Frontline" by Wilbur Daniel Steele, which was awarded first prize as the best short story published in America in 1916, by the O. Henry Contest of the Society of Arts and Sciences, will wonder how it could be presented faithfully as a picture play for the general idea hinges upon sound and hearing. It is said, however, that William Fox and D. Foster Charles J. Budge, by means of a number of ingenious devices, have achieved a sort of screen miracle in this regard, giving a vivid impression of the sound and hearing of frontlines throughout.
The plot includes Tyrone Power in the role of the blind soldier, Gerald Taylor, Tom Douglas and Gladys James.
