We read with great pleasure and great appreciation on the New Year's edition of the News-Review, in a comprehensive summing up of Douglas County, and our wonderful products and resources, and so many lines and in such a conclusive estimate of the possibility of our soil we were surprised as we added to the fine and perfect paper of our county sent town. We congratulate "our" News-Review on the production which we read and appreciated every line of it, and hastened to remail to our own beloved south, to the relatives who will understand that Oregon is our Oregon.

CHAPTERS FROM A WOMAN'S LIFE

By Jane Phelps

Chapter 23.

Claire Gordon invited me to go down to Long Island with her to call on a sick friend. And although Mrs. Page expected, didn't think it looked well for two women to motor about the country, and so on, I shut my ears and went, after telling Jennie I would be at home for dinner, and that Claire would stay with us.

"I'll be back by the time Walter is," I said, "but if we would be a little late tell him where I've gone. He knows Claire is an expert driver."

Mrs. Page sniffed. Had it been anyone but Claire, she would have said more; objected more strongly. It was a lovely day and with every mile we put behind us my spirits rose.

"It's so good to get away—to forget one's troubles and worries," I said to Claire, "not that mine are very serious, but I have been kept pretty close at home since Mrs. Page came."

"You're an angel to her! Walter doesn't know half the unpleasant hours she causes you. I'll bet," Claire answered.

"You win! But don't let's talk about her. I want to forget everything disagreeable today."

We called on Claire's ill friend, a dear little lady whose sweet patience with a long and painful illness made me feel I never would complain again.

We chatted with her half an hour, then left promising to come soon again. As I bade her goodbye, Mrs. Eldredge said to me:

"It has been delightful to meet you Mrs. Page. Meeting new people gives me something to think of, adds interest to life."

"When we were once more in the car I said to Claire: 'Doesn't it make you feel as if you were somewhat small to ever worry when you see a person like Mrs. Eldredge, that just meeting a stranger means interest in life? We have so many interests, think so little of them.'"

"Mrs. Eldredge hasn't walked in over five years and I never have seen her different than she was today. She's so grateful for company, for a visit from someone from the world from which she is shut out. She was very popular, very wealthy. She had a terrible fall, and may never walk again. But I never have heard a complaint from her lips." Claire told me, then we talked of other things.

"I'm hungry, Dorcas, suppose we stop at a little road house I know and get a bite? It's only 3 o'clock, and we'll have plenty of time."

"I believe I am hungry too; this bracing air I guess," I replied.

She ran the car into the driveway of an attractive building set some distance back from the road, the porch covered with rambler roses, flowering shrubs, and gay beds of brilliant colored blossoms on the spacious lawn.

As she parked the car beside three or four others, I gave a start. Surely the further roadster was Walter's! Then I smiled at my foolish thought. There were other roadsters of the same make, the same color.

A number of tables on the porch were occupied as we mounted the steps. At one directly in our line of vision sat Walter and Helen Ralstrom. Claire saw them at the same moment I did. She grabbed and whispered:

"Beware, Dorcas! Don't let them know you care! Talk, laugh, say something."

I had felt myself growing pale and my knees felt weak. But Claire's voice, her quick appreciation of what I had to do, braced me and I said something to her, then pretended to have just seen Walter and Helen. I went directly to them, followed by Claire:

"Hello, Walter. How do-do, Miss Ralstrom," I said, "isn't this a charming place? Claire told me I'd enthrall you."

Walter looked at it he didn't quite know what to say or do; but he was a man of the world and quickly collected himself and smiling talked with Claire while I asked Helen if she had entirely recovered.

"You'll sit down with us?" he said, turning to me.

"No, thank you! We're in a hurry, and want just a sandwich, Claire has to get back," I told him, and Claire agreed that we would be more quickly served by ourselves. We took a table near them and chatted while we ate a sandwich and drank a cup of tea. Then we bade them goodbye, Walter declaring he'd beat us home even though they had not yet been served.

ALL EYES TURN OUR WAY In the great drama of the world, the farmer holds the center of the stage. He is the hero, upon whom the spotlight plays. This is no unusual that it may be regarded as a new social phenomenon. Farming has always been regarded as a useful occupation, and at election time there was a certain amount of hand-shaking and back-slapping to keep honest Farmer John in a good humor. But in a general way he was supposed to be like the other children—be seen and not heard—not speak unless he was spoken to.

Farmer John began to play his new part during the war. Food was the principal thing, and nothing was too good for our hero. He was called to the center of the stage and given a star part to play. It must be admitted that he liked the plaudits of the multitude—and especially liked the leading player's place on the pay roll. After the armistice the scene changed. Farmer John was sent back into the ranks of the supernumeraries. He was deflated—the first, last and just about the only principal actor to suffer a severe cut in salary. He naturally set up a terrible outcry. The other players get their lines twisted and the whole piece went wrong. "What in Time's the matter with Farmer John?" everybody began to ask. "See what he wants and give it to him." It was very easy to find out what he wanted—but not so easy to restore to him his proper place on the program. He is playing a star part now—everybody is trying to reconstruct things so he can get his fair share of the box office receipts. —Farm Life.

BASKETBALL GAME TO BE PLAYED TONIGHT

An interesting game of basketball is looked for tonight when the team of the Christian Church meets the Canyonville All-Stars. Both teams are heavy and fast and are well matched, although the visiting aggregation is the more experienced. The game will be played at the high school gymnasium with a preliminary between the freshman team of the local high school and the Boy Scouts. The preliminary starts at 7:30 and is expected to be a fast contest. Rev. H. L. Caldwell is to serve as referee in the main game.

WOLF CREEK TAVERN GOOD STOPPING PLACE

Several parties of Roseburg motorists have visited the Wolf Creek Tavern during the past few weeks, and have found the Tavern, under new management, an ideal place to stop when going south on the highway. The Tavern is under the new management of John L. Dougal of Portland, who is making it an exceedingly up to date and modern hostelry. Mr. Dougal has traveled a great deal, and knows how to make the public comfortable. He has also been in the hotel business before. The interior of the Tavern has been entirely rebuilt and modernized with new furniture, bath-rooms, electric lights, French windows and doors, and other touches. The ladies room is entirely fitted up with dainty wicker furniture and good pieces of old mahogany are in many of the rooms. Mr. Dougal expects to carry out the old stage coach theme in exploiting the Tavern which was once a stopping place for the stage coach that made regular trips through the canyon.
