CHAPTERS FROM A WOMAN'S LIFE

By Jane Phelps

Chapter 27.

It was a few moments after the dinner hour when we returned, and as we sat down at the table I noted a frown on Mrs. Page's face. She always showed displeasure when either of us were late for meals.

"I'm sorry we were late," I said. "But Helen insisted Walter take her home and I went along for the ride."

Her face cleared instantly and she gave me an approving glance. I had thoroughly enjoyed my ride. Walter was good-natured, full of character, but I knew Helen was angry. She was too soft-spoken to have it real and the glint in her eyes when she bade me goodbye held a menace. But I cared nothing for that! I had spoiled her ride alone with Walter. And I had him to myself on the return trip.

"It was only fair to take her home," Walter explained to his mother. "I had kept her an hour overtime. Posing is hard work, although most people don't think so. Holding one position for hours; often holding a certain expression, isn't easy. And Helen is the best model I ever had."

"Your picture is nearly finished. Doreen tells me," Mrs. Page replied. "Yes, and I believe it will be one of my best. Connor is enthusiastic over it. I think a heap of his judgment."

"Send you rest awhile after this one is finished?" she asked. I felt a little thrill of delight. I was sure she meant to disapprove if he spoke of using Helen Ralston as a model for another picture.

"No indeed! I've another picture in my mind, an Allegorical subject. I'll give Miss Ralston a week's rest, then get at it."

"You intend to use her?" "Yes, mother. She is exactly suited to the idea I have in mind. Might have been born for the part."

"I don't like that girl, Walter. I don't trust her."

"Nonsense!" he flushed with annoyance, and perhaps something more.

"Helen's all right. Beautiful girls are seldom liked by other women; but I thought you were too sensible, mother, to take that attitude."

"And too old?" "Yes, perhaps."

I had said nothing, but now I asked: "Tell us something of this new picture—of the subject?"

"It is hazy as yet. But if I cling to my idea, I shall paint Helen as a water nymph, in floating draperies, and—"

"That doesn't mean she won't be properly dressed in your studio, I hope," his mother interrupted.

"Well, as water nymphs haven't been depicted wearing short skirts and sweaters, I'm afraid I shall follow the Allegory in my picture."

"Why not use Doreen for the new picture? For such a subject it seems to me it would be more delicate. You could use some other face."

Walter laughed gleefully. Then said: "Every man to his trade, Mother. I'm afraid you will have to let me be the judge of my models." Nothing more was said. To Walter the suggestion had been only amusing.

A day or two afterward I again stopped in the studio. I caught Walter in the midst of repeating what his mother had said concerning using me as a model for his new picture.

"Your mother doesn't like me," Helen said. "I wonder why?"

"The matter is very obstinate. She never stoops to explain and if I asked her she would probably make no reply; or one that would displease you."

"Your mother is very aristocratic and very—intuitive," I said. "I won't let you slander her. And Helen should be very grateful to her; she was more than kind after your accident."

"She got rid of me in a hurry," Helen replied, "even if she was kind. I wonder why she was so afraid to have me in the house? Afraid I'd steal your young affections, Walter, I'll bet."

She had spoken lightly, pleasantly, but she watched me through narrowed lids, a habit she had.

"I rather imagine Walter's affections aren't so easily gained. His artist imagination is easily fired; but affection is another thing," I said, while Walter thinking we were chaffing each other only laughed.

But both Helen Ralston and I knew that there was a deeper meaning in our words than appeared on the surface.

"You're neither thin, or liason enough to pose for Walter's contemplated picture," she said, after looking at me in a way I resented. "Mrs. Page evidently cares more for Walter's morals, then for his success as an artist."

TOMORROW—"Grace Harter mystifies Helen Ralston."

MUST PAY TAXES AFTER MANY YEARS

PLOVER, Wis., Jan. 17.—For the first time in several years taxpayers of this city must pay taxes on their property here.

For the last few years this little northern town, known as the taxpayers' Utopia, has had the distinction of being the only city in the country where residents did not have to pay a property tax.

Failure of a large paper mill, the town's chief industry, to make any profits this year and thereby pay sufficient money into the town treasury to pay all expenses incurred, has caused the town board to make a small levy on property.
