CONTROL OF DISEASES AND PESTS VITALLY IMPORTANT TO ALL ORCHARDISTS

(By County Agent Cooney)

The inspection of nursery stock is the first step in the annual fight. After trees are planted the big ofensive drive is on its way. From this point forward no quarter is shown to any plant disease or insect pest. Any lifting of the chemical barrage will immediately be answered by an advance of hosts of disease and pests. Poisoned gas fighting was used many years by horticulturists before it was adopted in modern warfare. It has saved the day in many insect battles, and will be used for years to come, but the main protection will come from the timely use of our chemical sprays. The County Agent and his assistant can always be found at their posts of duty and will do everything possible to assist the growers in making the fight successful. Organization and co-operation are as vital in the ultimate success as it is in any modern army. The County Agent requests the co-operation and timely advice in the campaign. Do not hesitate to write or call on him for information relating to the many problems that confront every orchardist in the county. In the control of diseases and insect pests, this thought should be kept in mind. Results will come through but one channel, prevention. Ninety-eight percent of our campaign will be on this basis. There are but few, if any, cures to offer the orchardists. When disease and pests are once established the grower is put to a decided disadvantage. If diseases are causing the grower a loss, let us have the information as the law provides for a just

PORTLAND'S TEAM ROSTER ANNOUNCED

PORTLAND, ORE., Feb. 15.—(United Press).—Thirty-four players are on the tentative, and probably permanent roster of the Portland Pacific Coast League baseball team, according to the announcement of Secretary Fred B. Rivers. One or two deals are pending which may cut off a pair of rookies before the first fango of the training season cracks off the bat.

Pitchers will hop a rattler for Hanford February 19, and the balance of the squad, all of whose contracts should be in the hands of Secretary Rivers by that time are due to arrive there February 26.

The roster includes thirteen pitchers, six catchers, nine infielders, and six outfielders. Of the pitchers, five are rookies. Schwartz and Gilbert got a little fast time experience near the fag end of last year's season. Hein is from Portland, a product of the sand lots, and Hickey hails from Sacramento.

With the exception of Bahr, a rookie from San Francisco, all the outfielders are veterans. Four of the infielders are rookies, including Hughes, son of the mighty Jay Hughes who twirled for Coast League teams when the league was in its infancy.

Scout Tom Turner is angling for another catcher and for perhaps one more infielder. If he puts the deal over—and no one knows whether he will or not for Tom is very secretive about it—the new pair will report at Hanford and swell the squad to an even three dozen, provided none of the rookies are shipped out before they arrive.

The complete roster as announced by Secretary Rivers is as follows:

Pitchers: Manager Middleton, Leversen, Sutherland, Yarrison, Sullivan, Crumpler, Schroeder, Sebert, Raehak, Schwartz, Gilbert, Hein and Hickey; Catchers: Shandling, King, Syler, Furman, Casey, Gleason; Infielders: Slade, Brazill, McCann, Poole, Drumett, Knoebel, Connolly, Hughes and Zelder; Outfielders: Cox, High, Wolfier, Gresset, Leo King and Bahr.

"CATFISH" SIMPSON GETS HIS FREEDOM

(By United Press)

SAN PEDRO, Calif., Feb. 15.—"Catfish" Simpson, negro, called "Catfish" because he is reported to have the largest mouth on Catalina Island, is free again after having promised to pay his wife $30 back alimony.

"Catfish" told the court that when the sheriff came after him with a warrant he had scraped together enough money to pay the alimony, but that the sheriff was a voluble creature and told everyone what he had come after, with the result that all of Catfish's other creditors were there to collect—and did—first.

Simpson has been prosecuted 16 times for failure to provide. He is very reluctant to do so, he admits, because of a little dispute over a small matter with his wife. He claims that they have only two children, while she says that they have four. They have separated to avoid further argument. Catfish, however, still objects to paying for the upkeep of four.

Catfish's every appearance in court is the signal for a good-sized crowd for he is famous for the size of his mouth. Now and then he demonstrates at a Catalina Island parlor that he can place three billiard balls in his mouth at the same time.

Asked if he could put two bowling balls in at once, Catfish said he had never tried, but would practice up and see what he could do.

WOULD VACCINATE ALL OF THE FIDOES

(By United Press)

SANTA ANNA, Cal., Feb. 15.—"Yap! Yap! Yap!" will soon mingle with the children's wail "Woowoo, I don't want to be vaccinated," if District Attorney A. P. Nelson has his way. Nelson wants all dogs in the county "scratched," and given a shot of antibodies serum, to put a stop to the spread of the disease in southern California.

David Evans, 15, was recently bitten and infected by a stray dog. This, protection to the growers property.

The County Agent has available a number of circulars and bulletins that will keep the grower posted on the best methods of production.

CHAPTERS FROM A WOMAN'S LIFE

By Jane Phelps

CHAPTER 32

Mrs. Page was absolutely devoted to baby Jack. Even before he came she had spoken of selling her California property and coming east to live, so she could be near Walter, her only close relative. Since baby's arrival she had mentioned it more often.

I had taken Jack and had gone home for a week. What a time father and mother made over him, and me. I fairly reveled in the petting I got from them all. Mother and I talked of Mrs. Page, and I told her how I had learned to like her, although she annoyed me often, and sometimes made me angry.

"She seems to like me in her cold, distant way," I said, "but it is so different from your way, Mother. Insists upon being called 'Mrs. Page.' I should have loved to call her 'Mother' when she first came, but now I don't think I could. It wouldn't seem natural. Rather different from you and Walter. He hardly waited until we were married to claim you."

"We can't all be alike, dear," mother replied, "and I am sure she has many good qualities. You will love her in time, and she you. An old woman as alone as she is, is to be pitied. I don't wonder she talks of coming east to live near you and Walter."

The day I returned Mrs. Page said:

"I have decided to go home in a few days, sell my home, and settle in the east. I have talked it over with Walter, and he insists I make my home here with you, and while I feel disposed to travel and make visits, I should relieve me from care, and I should be with Jack. Her voice took on a tender tone as she mentioned the baby, taking away in part the rebellious feeling that had swept over me when she told of the arrangement, made while I was away and without consulting me. How like Walter it was.

"When shall you go?" I asked, not knowing what to say, even though she had mentioned "in a few days."

The last of the week, Walter, you see about my transportation, dear. You are agreeable to the arrangement, Doreen?" she asked with one of her hard, keen glances. Walter's eyes were upon me, a frown on his face at my hesitation. "Certainly," I said.

"We will take a larger apartment and have another maid," she added. "I shall pay my share of household expenses. I shouldn't consent to live with you unless we made such an arrangement."

"Consent! No more long evenings with Walter, just we two alone; her sharp eyes and sharper tongue criticizing my every movement. I felt like screaming at her that I couldn't have her, that I wouldn't!"

I looked directly at her. She was setting old in a proud, haughty sort of way: was a lonely woman, and she had no one but us, Walter, little Jack, and—Mrs. Walter left for the studio, and we still sat at the table. When we rose she slipped her hand through my arm, and said:

"I couldn't live away from you all now that I have been with you so long."

"We will try to make you happy," I replied. The subject wasn't mentioned between us again before she left.

Walter, however, talked of it. Said he:

"It'll be jolly having the Mater live with us, leave you free to come and go, and feel perfectly safe about Jack. I think we will take a long trip south this winter. We haven't been anywhere to speak of since we were married. We can afford it and I have been thinking of it for some time."

"Oh, how jolly! Really do you think we may go?" I asked, delighted. Walter was the most charming traveling companion one could imagine, always gay, so full of fun, seeing everything.

"Yes, I am sure we shall. You see if mother weren't with us, we'd have to take the boy and a nurse. If we had any kind of a time that would be expensive, and a nuisance. Young babies are better off at home. And mother knows how to take care of him."

"She'll have him spoiled by the time we get back," I laughed.

"Never mind! Let her spoil him. It will do her good, and won't hurt him." Then, in another tone: "It was nice of you not to object to mother's living with us. I couldn't refuse her the way she put it to me, but I was afraid you would not like it. You're a dear to be so nice about it."

"I'd be very selfish to refuse your mother a home with us," I answered, "and she does love Jack." It was all I could say; even the thought of the trip hadn't made me quite reconciled.

"HOMESPUN FOLKS" GIVES A PEEP AT NEWSPAPER PLANT

The small town newspaper office, with its antiquated presses and a mischievous ink besmeared little printer's devil, the country lawyer's sanctum, with rows of dust covered law books, political campaign headquarters in the town livery stable, all were indelibly stamped on the retentive young memory of Julien Josephson, author of "Homespun Folks," a Thomas H. Ince-Associated Producers production, which will be presented at the Majestic Theatre tonight, and he has faithfully recalled and reproduced them on the screen.

The settings of "Homespun Folks," both interior and exterior, are said to be the typical and most accurate in detail that have ever served as the background of a rural photoplay.

GORGEOUS WEDDING IN PICTURE

The gorgeous wedding of Princess Mary Tudor and King Louis XII of France is one of the picturesque scenes in the picturized version of "When Knighthood Was in Flower," which had to be omitted from the stage production in 1901. The Cosmopolitan production of "When Knighthood Was in Flower," with Marion Davies in the role of Princess Mary Tudor, which plays at the Antlers Theatre again tonight shows it in its entirety. Robert C. Vignola directed the picture and Joseph Urban designed the elaborate settings which are said to set a high water mark in film-dom.

EVERYTHING'S RICH AND GIRLS PRETTY IN "RICH MEN'S WIVES"

A story rich in human appeal, settings rich and in good taste, a cast rich in talent and feminine beauty are the outstanding characteristics of "Rich Men's Wives," a Preferred Picture, which opened yesterday at the Liberty Theatre for a stay of only two days.

In many ways this is one of the most unusual screen dramas that has been shown here in many a day and Gasnier, the producer who attached such artistic heights in making "Rich Men's Wives," is said to be commended for giving to picture lovers what may in all legitimacy, be termed an exceptional entertainment.

While the story, which is the collaborative effort of Frank Dacey and Agnes Christine Johnston, turns the searchlight on the follies of the idle rich, it nevertheless shows deep understanding and sympathy for the unfortunate girls who are born, bred and imprisoned in gilded cages.
