"A PURITAN WIFE"

By Jane Phelps

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Ann Peabody, a New England girl teaching in California, meets and marries a rancher, Dick Beldon. Ned and Bessie Prentice own a neighboring ranch and the couples become friends. Grace Edmunds, a cousin of Ned Prentice, visits at the Prentice home. She is beautiful but soulless. They have parties, Grace monopolizing Dick until Ann is hurt and jealous, she also spends much time with him in the orchards—laughs when he drinks, and forgets, making Ann frantic. The latter fears this habit of Dick's.

CHAPTER XIII

Ned and Grace planned an all day Sunday outing. They would go to the shore, carry luncheon, bathe and have an enjoyable day. It would be a treat for them all. They were to call for Dick and Ann as their ranch was on the way.

Ned had a larger car than Dick and offered to carry the luncheon baskets. Ann made several trips back and forth into the house, bringing out her boxes and so on, dutifully filled. As she brought out the last parcel Grace was climbing into the roadster beside Dick.

"I'll ride with Dick, Ann. You can have my place with Bessie," she called nonchalantly.

Ann had looked forward to the long ride with Dick, she so seldom left the ranch. But she would not hurt Bessie's feelings by showing her regret and took her seat beside her, making no reply, but straining to hear what Dick said to his companion.

"My old driver is flattered, Grace," he said. "To think you prefer it to Ned's car is quite a compliment. Getap, Dobbin! Show the lady what you can do," he added gayly, giving the old roadster Ann's name for it.

"How about the chauffeur being complimented?" Grace returned. "Aren't you a bit proud that I choose to go with you?"

"You bet I am! I'm all puffed up! Come on Ned, I'll lend the way."

Ann bit her lips. The gay banter had upon her. Grace's constant bid for admiration seemed so unwomanly, so unkind when it was aimed at Dick and Ned. She hated the thought of her Dick taking the long ride with Grace, yet she bravely hid her disappointment, and chatted with Bessie and Ned, sure Bessie was happier because of the change.

It was a glorious morning and as they skinned along California's perfect roads Ann's spirits rose, and she forgot to feel anxious and gave herself up to the fascination of the ride, the enjoyment of the changing scenery.

They had time to bathe before luncheon and once more Ann felt a stab of jealousy as Grace and Dick, with Ned close behind, swam out far beyond where either she or Bessie dared go. Grace was a strong and graceful swimmer and as she raced the boys their gay voices floated back to the two wives paddling near shore.

When tired they swam slowly back. Grace with a hand on each man's shoulder, looking very lovely, and all three of them seemingly oblivious of everything but each other.

They threw themselves full length on the sand, and Dick said: "Too bad you girls don't swim! Grace is some mermale."

"Bessie and I haven't had an opportunity to learn," Ann replied, then proposed they dress, pleading hunger. Grace was pelting Dick with sand, teasing him, as usual ignoring her and Bessie.

They spread their luncheon under a clump of trees some distance from the bathers. Grace played ball with the boys while Ann and Bessie spread the cloth, and laid out the food. Ned teased her about her laziness and she laughingly said: "I never was a domestic animal! And I've noticed the women who are never get much attention. You boys know you'd rather have me swim and play ball with you than do what any stupid woman can do."

It was cruel speech, even if one excused it on the ground of thoughtlessness. Ann turned away to hide the flush it brought to her face. She had tried so hard to learn to be a good housekeeper for Dick, to cook, and do all the things that make home comfortable. Grace considered her too stupid to do anything but menial work and had not hesitated to say so.

The day to which she had looked forward to so happily was proving a disappointment, although she bravely tried to hide her chagrin. Luncheon was soon dispatched, and while Grace and the boys smoked their cigarettes, she and Bessie cleared away.

Grace had picked up a long, slender stick and had swaggered with it, saying women were carrying canes in San Francisco, that she must get one and so on. As Ann, both hands filled, rose from a stooping posture, Grace laid the stick down in such a way the former stumbled and fell, the basket and box flying from her hands.

"Yes, my ankle," she was very white and Dick carried her to the foot of a large tree where she could lean against the trunk while Bessie took off her shoe and stocking, then bathed the swollen ankle. She had twisted it badly, but after it was bound up she insisted the day mustn't be spoiled for the others—that they were to do anything they wished while she looked on.

"She did that purposely, Ann," Bessie whispered. "She deliberately put that stick where you would fall over it."

"You must be mistaken, Bessie. She has no reason to wish to injure me." But the suggestion rankled, and Ann watched Grace more closely than she otherwise would, noticed her attempts to hold Dick's attention to keep him at her side.

PRISON FUTILE AGAINST AGED STATUTE BREAKER

ROME, Ga., April 30.—The Rome Ministerial Association has been called by Judge J. W. Nunnally to assist him in passing on the case of Will Martin, aged violator of State laws.

According to Judge Nunnally, Martin is 70 years old and has spent 16 1/2 years of the last twenty-five on the chain-gang without having been benefited in the least.

The Judge admits frankly that he's at the end of his row, and doesn't know what to do.

Martin's most recent offense, for which he was convicted, was for violating the State liquor laws and receiving stolen chickens.

"It's up to the Ministerial Association. If they say State Farm, State Farm it will be. If they say chain-gang, there is where he will go. If they say turn him loose—I'm going to do that," the Judge declared.

SPRINKLES REFUSE TO SPRINKLE ANY LONGER

(International News Service.)

GALVESTON, Ind., April 30.—Who will sprinkle the village streets if William Sprinkle and his son, Sam Sprinkle, refuse to sprinkle? This is the question that is facing the town of Galveston. The Sprinkles have operated the local water works since it was started twenty three years ago. Now they claim that they can no longer live up to their moist cognomen, as they are not making money. They have petitioned the Indian Public Service Commission for authority to abandon the plant.

"ENOUGH," SAYS COP WHO DIDN'T NAME SON THAT

(International News Service.)
HAMMOND, Ind., April 30.—"Enough" is the cry that has gone up from Aloysius Hart, former Hammond police officer, who thought it was a good joke when he announced that he would name his fifth son "Enough."

The joke went all over the world and when Hart saw it in a London paper he declared that the thing had gone far enough. He appealed for censorship on all "Enough items," explaining that the baby's real name is Michael George Hart.
