BASEBALL DANCE THURSDAY NIGHT

A big baseball benefit dance will be held at the armory on next Thursday night with the Umpqua orchestra furnishing the music. The dance will undoubtedly attract a large crowd as the fans should get the home boys in their uniforms to earn enough money to buy suits and equipment. The dance will start at 8:30 o'clock and run until after midnight. Some of the features being planned for the evening are a cordial invitation extended to the entire county to help and assist in making the dance a success.

A ball team will play their first game next Sunday. Sutherland will oppose the locals and a lively game is expected.

AN DELEGATION ATTENDS CHURCH

A large delegation of Klansmen attended the church service.

They attended the patriotic program prepared for the evening. The men had previously announced their intention of attending the service and had asked that reservations be made for them. This was done in a special section of the church being reserved for them. The emblems of the Klan, the fiery cross and the American flag, were used in display upon the platform.

Rev. Hilson preached a patriotic sermon, urging the support of all citizens for law and order and cooperation with the officials of government, commending the Klan for its stand on loyal citizenship and its acceptance of the Bible as its guide.

In addition to the sermon a trombone and saxophone duet, vocal solo and piano, violin and flute trio were presented.

The Klansmen presented the church with a very liberal donation of cash for the fund which the church is endeavoring to raise for the construction of a new building.

DAIRY RANCH TRADED FOR PRUNE LAND

An important real estate transfer was made late Saturday when Loyal Emery traded his 480 acre farm at Wilbur to N. LaRue of Salem, for the 100 acre farm belonging to Mr. LaRue and located at Brockway.

Mr. Emery's place is devoted to raising livestock, and dairying and is a very valuable piece of land. Mr. LaRue's farm is good prune land, 4 acres of bearing orchard being included in the 100 acre tract. Mr. Emery intends to put out more trees soon.

is Marriage Journey's End to Modern Couples?

Some Feminists Disagree With Famous Beauty in Discussion

Gloria Foy, a recent addition to Broadway's glittering constellation, has unleashed a violent debate upon the Klans by asserting that marriage should be "journey's end" to modern couples as it was to their grandparents.

The Lucy Stone Leaguers, feminists, professional and even home women have all taken issue with the pretty star of "Up She Goes".

MARRIAGE NOT ANCHOR

"Their unanimous opinion seems to be," complains Gloria, "that marriage is not journey's end, but a step in life of little more importance than the purchase of a new frock or the obtaining of a new job. If you do not like the frock, you can return it. If the job doesn't suit, you can give it up. That's exactly what they do with husbands."

JOURNEY'S END

"Now I was trained in another school and I agree with the song, 'Journey's End,' that started the whole argument. I believe you should first be sure you have the right man, then if he stands the test that all girls who have been trained by good mothers know how to apply, marry him, build a home and stick until death do you part. In other words, call the marriage ceremony, 'Journey's End'!"

"A PURITAN WIFE"

By Jane Phelps

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Anna Peabody a New England girl married Dick Belden, a California rancher. Ned and Bessie Prentice on a neighboring ranch, become friendly. Grace Edmunds, Ned's cousin, visits them and Ann does all she can to make her visit pleasant. But Grace has no use for either Bessie or Ann, and by her actions makes them both unhappy. On a picnic, Grace puts a stick where Ann falls over it, and is injured. She also introduces Hugh Norton, who sees at once how things are. He is sorry for Ann. Grace returns home. Ann has a son. She and Dick are very happy until he drinks and forgets again.

CHAPTER XIX

Ann had written her mother, asking if either she or her father were ill as she had not heard from them. But it takes several days for mail to cross the continent and then rural delivery is slow.

"I will surely hear today," she said to Dick. "If I don't see a telegram, I am sure something is wrong."

That morning she decided to clean her closets. Taking down Dick's suit he had worn to town, she saw it badly needed pressing, and laid it over a chair until she finished with the closet. As she threw the coat down a letter dropped from the pocket. She picked it up. It was addressed to her, in her father's handwriting.

She tore it open and read: "Dear Ann: Your mother hasn't been well lately, the doctor says she must have a change. If you would like her to visit you for a month or two let me know by return mail, or by wire, as she must get away at once."

The letter was dated five days before Dick had gone to town. It was nearly three weeks since it had been sent.

Ann dropped a crumpled heap into a chair. What did it mean? Then there flashed over her memory that look on Dick's face, that puzzled look, as if he were trying to remember something. But how did he happen to get the letter, instead of its being delivered?

She could scarcely wait until he came in for his noonday meal to ask. Then she asked quietly, but with lips that trembled: "Dick, when did you get this letter?" and laid it before him.

"That's what I couldn't remember," he said flushing. "I was in the post office and the postmaster gave it to me, said it had just come in on the mail; that you wouldn't get it by delivery until the next day. I'm awfully sorry I forgot Ann. Is it important?"

"Read it." Then: "What must they think? Oh, suppose mother should die, and I never see her again; and she might have been here with us for two months—and seen the baby and—" she burst into a very temper of sob and tears.

"Don't, Ann. Don't! dear! I'll telephone a message to the telegraph office at once."

"They gave you the letter after you had been drinking?" Ann asked. "Must of—never remembered a thing about it." He went to the telephone, sent a wire to Mr. Peabody asking him for an answer. Then tried to comfort Ann.

"I told you you'd forget once too often!" she sobbed. "If mother dies I'll never forgive you!"

"Don't say that, Ann. Perhaps she will come. It may not be too late."

The next morning however they received a long telegram from Ann's father, a night message. Said he:

"Not hearing from you mother went south to her cousin's. She will be home in a week or two, is much better, but another journey is out of the question."

"He can't afford it! And to think she might have been with us," Ann sobbed.

"I'll pay her fare," Dick said. "I'll do anything if only you will stop crying." He never had seen Ann cry like this. In fact she had wept very seldom.

He immediately sent another message saying that if Mrs. Peabody would visit them he would gladly pay the fare. But the answer was disappointing. She would not come now—perhaps some other time.

Ann grieved for weeks although she tried not to show it. Dick was very patient, and tried to make up to her in every way for the sorrow his forgetfulness had caused. Ann had written her father explaining she did not receive his letter until it was nearly three weeks old, but giving no cause for the delay. He would blame the postal service.

"Promise me you'll never drink again, Dick! Do promise me!" she begged.

"I wouldn't keep it, Ann. There's no use making it. I can't stand the boys giving me—saying you won't let me—that I am tied to your apron strings and all that stuff. I may be weak, but I can't stand ridicule," he morosely replied to her urging.

Dick was weak. Ann had tried not to acknowledge it even to herself. But always she had felt it. It was that same weakness that had made him play around with Grace Edmunds, give her the chance to tempt him. His inability to say "no!" That day he had taken her to San Bernardino she had made him forget his promise; he couldn't say no to her when she wanted to remain.

"You will drink and forget once too often, Dick. When you do, remember that there comes a time when even a wife who loves cannot forgive. I am afraid for you, Dick! Afraid for myself, afraid for Jack!"

"Nonsense! I'll try to pass up the boys after this. Keep away from them," he told her, and with that she had to be content.
