In the morning Ned came over with Grace's suitcase and offers of help, if there was anything he or flessie could do. Only then, and from something he said to Grace some faughing remark about playing narse, did Ann realize Grace's intention to remain.

She felt as if she should scream, go mad if Grace stayed, yet she had heard Dick say:

'len't it bully of her? Ann will appreciate her taking care of a goruchy. I feel it coming on right now, Of all the times to get hurthoffers, Ned, it drives me almost wild.' Ned had replied in bluff fashien:

'I mustn't be so uncharitable.' Ann murmured as she dressed the baby, and gave him breakfast. 'I can't afford to spend a penny for help in the house.' Hat when a few moments later she went into the room where Dick lay, and found Grace rumpling him:

'A nurse must have something to do, you know, Dick, so I'll comb your hair. A Viking always wears his thrown back carelessly, not partied as Ann has done it.' She turned back, trembling with indigation.

"A nurse must have something to do, you know. Diek, so I'll comb your hair. A Viking always wears his thrown back carelessly, not parted as Ann has done it." She turned back, trembling with indigation. "I have you, baby!" she held little Jack close, "She never notices you any more than she does me." It had been at first a sore point, that Grace never seemed to see little Jack, never talked of, or to him. Now Ann was glad. He was hers, her very own.
