"A PURITAN WIFE"

By Jane Phelps

CHAPTER LI

Beatie Prentice was away, and although Ann missed her, she was not lonely. Doctor Grayson, occasionally Hugh, and some of the people on the nearer ranches dropped in and she spent a good deal of time with Dick.

"Strange what's become of Ned," Dick said. "Better call up, I guess, and see if there's anything the matter."

"Boss gone away," the Chick told them when they telephoned. "Gone San Francisco. He black plitty soon."

"Strange he didn't let us know he was going," Ann mused. "I would have sent for a few things. I hope there's nothing wrong."

Ann had spent the morning with Dick in the lemon orchard. As they drew near the house, talking earnestly of what they expected to do the coming year, Ann caught sight of a car.

"Company for lunch, Dick; I hope Nora has something good." They hastened their steps and on the porch stood Ned, beside a tall, slender figure in deep mourning.

"Oh—" Ann breathed. "Who can it be? Beatie?" she feared Beatie's mother, whom she was visiting might have passed away. She had not been well for some time.

"Hello, folks," Dick answered, then both he and Ann gasped. The black-clad figure with Ned was Grace Edmunds.

"What—what—" Ann stammered. "Grace's father and mother were killed in a railroad accident. I couldn't get you on the phone before I left," Ned explained.

"Oh, you poor child!" Ann exclaimed, going to Grace and impulsively extending both hands—everything forgotten but the horror of the thing, losing both parents at once.

"It was awful!" Grace shuddered, but her eyes were dry. "Please don't talk of it to me—not yet." Ann led the way into the house, insisting they must stay to lunch. Her eyes were full of tears for the orphaned girl, her heart ached for her. Suppose it had been her father and mother? She couldn't bear to think of it.

Grace was, if anything lovelier than ever, although she showed traces of grief and shock. But her mourning was most becoming, and stylishly made. Then she had a softer look, the hardness was gone from her eyes, and she seemed subdued.

"Who is that?" she asked when Nora left the room after serving Electric hot plates, $2.50 and up, Hudson Electric Store.

them. "We have a maid now Grace," Ann replied. "I spend a good deal of my time with Dick in the orchards."

"She's getting to be a real rancher too," Dick added. After luncheon the four sat on the porch, and Ned told them something of the accident. There had been a strike on the railroad, and the ties had been smashed for some distance. The train had gone off the track and some 12 or 15 killed, among them Mr. and Mrs. Edmunds.

"So Grace telegraphed me, and I had just time to catch the train. She will live with Beatie and me, unless she gets married, most of the time, as she has no other relatives."

Grace Edmunds had come back, this time to stay. The thought flashed through Ann's mind, but instantly followed by another; she was in sorrow, broken. She would no longer be a menace to her happiness. And she looked with pitying eyes at the slender figure in her black clothes.

"Have you given up your pictures for good?" Dick asked Grace. For the first time she showed animation, interest.

"Only for a time! Kellogg tried to put me in a small part; said I didn't screen as well as he expected I would. Gave the part I should have had to that Stanton girl's sister. He's hipped on that girl; can't see anyone else. I'm through with Kellogg," she finished rather drearily.

Ann took Ned and Grace to see the little room, hardly more than a lean-to Dick had put up for Nora. "We had no room for her in the house, so I have made this as comfortable as I could," Ann explained.

Grace had gone inside, and just as Nora appeared she picked up a picture from the stand and said: "What a horrid looking picture."

Ann flushed, sorry for Nora, who had turned away immediately. "It's a picture of a crippled brother of whom Nora was very fond."

"Ugh, it gives me the creeps!" Grace returned. It was not a prepossessing picture. Yet the face was pleasant. Ann had heard the rasping breath Nora had given as she turned away after hearing Grace's remark, and knew she was hurt.

Ned and Grace soon left, and Dick returned to work. But Ann sat on the porch, thinking, her hands idle. What would Grace's return to live with Ned mean to her?
