"A PURITAN WIFE" By Jane Phelps

CHAPTER LXVI For the remainder of the evening Ann never spoke to Grace, although she compelled herself to chat with Ned and Beattie. She had been terribly frightened, and Beattie, seeing the effort she was making, proposed an early departure. Dick agreed, then to remain, but as Ann could not talk to Grace, she went to her room, leaving the others to go.

As she stood talking to Beattie, while waiting for Ned to bring up the car, she heard Grace say to Dick, "The idea of Ann's leaving me for what Jack's did. You know I love him, but I never know anything but to love him. How you stand it to be so close to 'Poor Willing'?"

"She has spoken in a low tone, and Ann hadn't stopped chatting with Beattie, but she had heard every word distinctly. Sounded curious, and she was in the still California night.

"Goodnight, Ann," Grace called, "Get out of the right side of the bed in the morning and forget your dream."

Ann made no reply. Before they retired for the night, Ann and Dick quarreled bitterly. All Ann's pent-up feelings against Grace burst out in a flood of words, and she declared her opinion, and swore by anyone's friendship.

Dick became violently angry and took Grace's part, even saying that if Ann was half as fair and lady-like as Grace she would be able to understand her.

"You're such an infernal affect yourself," you say, "that a fellow should be afraid to love you. You should be married some four-hundred school master, one of your own kind, then he would have been satisfied to sit opposite your four legs, and have no friends. But I'm not that kind, and the answer you realize is the better." He snatched a dagger in his hand, and for the first time took a drink in Ann's presence without a remonstrance from her.

In the morning they breakfasted in silence. Dick left at once making no response to Jack's cry for his usual room.

Ann sat at the table, his slow words dropping unheeded on the floor. She was sorry she had quarreled with him but over and beyond that she was seeing that the end had come—that they could not go on. She took Dick's talk of Grace as another proof he loved her, that nothing would change him.

Nora came in, and laying her hand on Ann's shoulder said: "Please don't cry, you'll make yourself sick." The tender touch broke down the last bit of control Ann possessed, and she sobbed bitterly without restraint, her arms about the maid, little Jack clinging to her skirts and begging her not to cry.

"I'll fix her!" Nora said, after she had soothed Ann, and once more came about her kitchen work. "I'd almost kill her for this. Heiden." Dick did not come in to luncheon. At first Ann thought she would send Nora to call him, then decided not. It was the first time he had remained away since they had been married. He was angry at her because she had not been friendly toward Grace.

She ate her luncheon, then went about her work in a dull, listless, hopeless way. Never before had she failed to blame herself when they disagreed, to pray for patience and forbearance and to acknowledge herself as in the wrong. For the danger to Jack's life had hardened her, she saw only her own unhappiness, her dark future.

In the middle of the afternoon an automobile drove in, and the impatient honk-honk called her to the door. "I passed a runaway horse and found him in the road. This was the nearest house, so I brought him here," a big ranchman said as he lifted the limp form of Hugh Norton in his arms.

"Oh, is he badly hurt? Bring him right in," Ann said, distressed. "He's pretty bad. Anything I can do?" the man asked, as under Ann's direction he laid Hugh on the couch.

"Wait until I telephone the doctor, please," Ann said, "if I don't see him on the telephone, you can stop and leave word to come right over." Then as Hugh groaned, she bent over him. "Are you in much pain, Hugh?"

He smiled, but the smile quickly changed to a contortion of pain. "Here," he said, laying his hand on his chest.

Ann asked the man to loosen Hugh's clothes while she called Dr. Grayson. Fortunately he was at home, and would be right over. The ranchman, after seeing his services, went on his way, and Ann and Nora made Hugh as comfortable as possible while waiting for the doctor. He was only partly conscious, and Ann feared he might die before the doctor came. Dear Hugh, he had been so kind to her—always. He had tried to help her.

Tomorrow—Dick accuses Ann of loving Hugh.

to surpass in size anything ever grown here. The berries have been pooled by the producers and no set price has been offered. The market price after canning will be paid the producer, after the cost of canning has been deducted, and a good price is assured this year. Fine berry crops from every section are reported and the blackberry crop is to be one of the best crops this season. The evergreen blackberry is reported in abundance and will be marketed during the next month.

Peas the to form a bumper crop this year also. Indications are that this fruit will come up from preceding years and a good market is certain. The time for the marketing and canning of this fruit will not start until the middle of August, with a good price offered producers.

Surpassing all other crops this year and probably totaling up in size if not in tonnage, to last year's production, is the prune crop for the present year. The cannery in making preparations for the canning of a bumper crop of prunes and are expecting good fruit as a result of the rains and warm weather. On the whole the prune crop will probably form the primary canning activity for the late canning season.

Improvements made in machinery last year at the local cannery make the work this year much more modern and no time will be wasted with the installation of new machinery. Plenty of help is obtainable, assuring no delay from the lack of labor. Good wages are being paid and the condition of the fruit makes the work more pleasant and remunerative.

CLUB WILL HOLD GOLF TOURNAMENT

The Country club will be the scene tomorrow of an all day match in golf, such as the members of the local club have not had a chance to participate in before. Eddy Nunn, formerly of the Broadway Golf school in Portland, and at present one of the leading golf professionals of the state, has signed a two months' contract as instructor at the club and is opening his course with a Scotch two-ball foursome contest tomorrow. This contest is declared by golf enthusiasts all over the country to be one of the most interesting games of golf possible.

In this contest two players use one ball and are matched against two other players for the regular nine or eighteen hole game. The teams alternate on the tees, regardless of what happens on the green. With two on a team and with only one ball the game gives a great opportunity for competition. It is a new form of playing to the local club members and all are taking a great interest in learning it.

The game will start at 9 o'clock tomorrow and will continue all day. Mr. Nunn is today lining up the players in teams and is arranging the contestants so that the closest players will play opposite. A trophy will be given the winner of tomorrow's match. The prize will consist of golf equipment of some nature.

Mr. Nunn states that he is determined to put Roseburg on the golfing map and says that there is some excellent material for real golfers in the club roster.

TRANSPORTATION BIDS. The underseamed will receive bids up to Aug. 1, 1923 for the transportation of pupils on the up river route in School Dist. No. 15. Route extends from Coffee Creek to school house, near Days Creek P. O. School will begin about October 5. Good and sufficient bond required. For further information communicate with R. A.
