"A PURITAN WIFE"

By Jane Phelps

CHAPTER XXV

Ann looked for Grace. Twice she went to the door, but remained but a few moments each time. She knew even better her money, and she was in no mood for talking of it.

"I will wait at least later than Dick and Grace come by her face. Dick, for some reason, took the time to look at Ann, but said nothing. He was just looking at her. "I shall, never fear," he said. "I shall, never fear," he said. "I shall, never fear," he said.

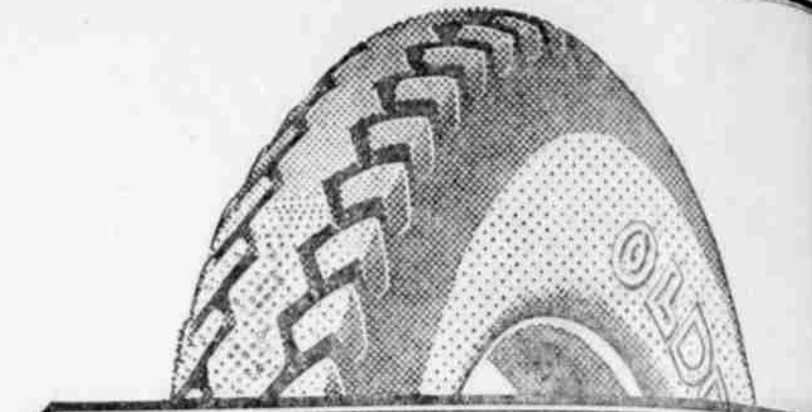

Ann went and went about as she always did, seeing that everything was right for the night. Then she went to bed at once. Dick, in spite of his restless nature, to retire, did not come until long afterward. Ann pretended to be asleep. She thought he had waited purposely, thinking she would talk.

In the morning, before he dressed, he looked on the living room door. "You are not up today, is your eye all right?" he asked. "Yes," she said. "I am all right, but I shall not go to work today. I shall stay at home and rest. I shall stay at home and rest. I shall stay at home and rest."

Ann went to her room and took out her trunk. She found a letter from Dick. It was from the day before. "I shall, never fear," he said. "I shall, never fear," he said. "I shall, never fear," he said.

With a quartet of top-provokers whose followers are legion and whose humorous portrayals have made the nation laugh, "Lark" presents in the cast Johnny Hines, the nation hero of the Topical comedy show, Charlie Murray, the side-splitting Mack Sennell star, Fina Finch, who with the late John Barry risked the furore of the whole movie public, and Judd Moran, whose inimitable portrayal made history in the movies. Aside from the glittering galaxy of top producers the dramatic element in "Lark" is well taken care of by Violet McQueen, Robert Liddon, Edmund Brown and Warner Richmond who climbed to fame with his remarkable portrayal of Dick Bartholomew brother in "Tolerable David."
