

Who Pays the Bill?

"I, said Mr. Consumer Gink; I with my pen and ink, I'll pay the bill."

Sure the consumer pays the bill, but why pay two bills for the same thing? The dealer's rent, interest, phone, taxes, clerk hire, etc., are all paid by the consumer in the price. If you buy part from one dealer and part from another, you force both of them to put a little more on the price. Buy all you can from one dealer and help out the cost of handling stuff; in other words, pay only one rent, one phone, one tax, and make the amount on each sack of feed smaller instead of larger.

Buy your feed, flour and farm machinery from us and make your share of the bill as small as possible. See us first. We can save you money.

THE MISFIT

By JANE PHELPS

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Natalie Horton, private secretary to a prominent lawyer, married Horace Crandell, a wealthy bachelor. She is very lovely and a clever business girl. He is wealthy, aristocratic, and lives with his widowed mother. The latter objects to Natalie, and insists Horace promise he will never leave her. After their honeymoon Horace takes Natalie to his mother's home, where she is allowed no part in its management.

Horace is indulgent and generous, but his mother claims all his evenings when at home, and he and Natalie never go out unless accompanied by her. Natalie is a stranger to their ways, is awkward and often embarrassed. Mrs. Crandell remains cold and unapproachable. Natalie never mistrusts part of it as a mother's jealousy of her only son. She only thinks Horace's mother resents her.

CHAPTER XII

"She may be a good girl, I think she is, and she is lovely to look at, no one would deny that, but she is a misfit. Horace, an absolute misfit, as I told you she would be. You can't transplant a cabbage, no matter how perfect it is as a cabbage, and produce a rose. You told me she was clever—yes, in some offices, perhaps she was. But she is an ignoramus as far as anything that fits her for a wife in your position. She can't talk. She has no real poise."

Mrs. Crandell was speaking. Natalie moved away. She had not intended to eavesdrop, but had stood as if glued to the stairs when she heard Horace's voice speaking of her, so had heard his mother's reply. Now she crept softly up to her room. There she locked the door and threw herself on the bed in a paroxysm of dislike and unhappiness. They had been talking in the library, the door ajar, and had not heard her come in. She knew that what had happened the night before accounted for the conversation. Mrs. Crandell had given a small dinner party. For the first time she had complimented Natalie on her appearance, and Natalie had gone down in a happy frame of mind. But several small mistakes, her inability to answer anything save "yes" or "no" to join in the conversation at the table had taken all her happiness from her, and afterward in the drawing room it had been worse. One or two men had hung over her, entranced by her beauty, but the women had let her severely alone after one or two unsuccessful attempts to make small talk with her. To her it was a foreign language. They asked if she played or sang, she told them no, she could not ride horseback, she did not play bridge or tennis. It was a long torture to her. And through it all she heard the ray of reprieve in which Horace joined flung back and forth.

But all through dinner she was distracted, the word "misfit" rung in her ears. Mrs. Crandell was thoughtful also, she had been chastened, mortified, and she was not the sort who easily forgets or forgives a social omission. She was ashamed of Horace's wife.

tre today and tomorrow. It rings true on a clear note of beauty, at the same time telling a story of real interest and strong dramatic situations. While its main theme is the love of home and of parents for their children, and vice versa, it is woven naturally into a romance of youth.

Antlers Theatre
"Learn while you laugh, and laugh while you learn."
This might have been the motto that Mark Twain kept on his desk had while he wrote "A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court," which, in film form, is showing at the Antlers Theatre as a special William Fox attraction.

But Mark Twain had no such idea. "A Connecticut Yankee" was meant to be instructive. It was meant to throw ridicule upon the idea that the Middle Ages were a better time than the present. But it teaches in spite of itself. The adventures of young Martin Canfield among King Arthur's knights and ladies tell better than all the history books, just what life in the Middle Ages was like—without plumbing, without telephone, without good roads.

"A Connecticut Yankee" has done more than any other book or play to prove that men are as chivalrous today as they were in the days when knights were bold.

Liberty Theatre
"Breaking Home Ties" is not one of those pictures you sit through unmoved and forget about as soon as you reach the doors of the theatre. It creeps under your skin so gradually that you are aware of what is happening until you suddenly find you're bit hard and your eyes are moist.

There is nothing mammoth about this Associated Exhibitors feature, which remains at the Liberty Theatre today and tomorrow.

without effort, reprieve she didn't even understand.

And now this! Mrs. Crandell was trying to get Horace against her. But she was right; she was a misfit, a horrible misfit. What was she going to do? It would take her years to learn about all these things others talked of, years to learn to do them. And all the time there was Horace's mother trying to wean him from her by forcing him to talk of her shortcomings.

Natalie didn't cry, her trouble was too deep for tears. If only she did not love Horace so. But with marriage her love had increased for the handsome man who had chosen her above all these women in his own set.

"He didn't know what a fool I was—he hadn't a chance to find out," she excused him. "He talked to me of my work, things I knew about before we were married. I could discuss them, and interest him, but now—she jumped up, went into the bathroom, bathed her face, and when he came in welcomed him as usual. She had made it nothing else. He must never know she had heard."

A misfit!
"Do you think I might take music lessons, Horace?" she asked, after a bit. "I have always been passionately fond of music, and I think I might learn to play even if I am old."

"Old, you aren't old," he said, turning to her. He had been unusually quiet, abstracted. This half hour or so, while they dressed for dinner, was almost the only time they had for confidences.

"Then shall I try?"
"Why—yes, it might be a good idea. I am afraid mother won't like to hear you practicing. It might disturb her. I'll talk it over with her."

"If I had a small piano in here she couldn't hear it so plainly," Natalie suggested. She never feared to speak of things that cost money. Mrs. Crandell seemed oblivious to that at least.

"That's a good idea, Natalie, I'll have a small upright sent up for you, and then we must find a good teacher—the best. Once the fear of disturbing the mother was obliterated, Horace grew quite enthusiastic and promised to attend to it at once.

"He's so good to me," Natalie said to herself as she hurried to finish dressing. "I must try to learn things so he won't be ashamed of me."

Majestic Theatre
"The Secret of the Hills," the Antonio Moreno feature which will be shown at the Majestic Theatre tonight, is adapted from a highly successful novel by William Garrett, the English writer. The continuity was prepared by E. Magnus Ingleton, who has prepared many well known screen adaptations from famous novels.

In this production Antonio Moreno assumes the role of a young American who encounters a series of amazing adventures in London and in the highlands of Scotland because two beautiful girls lead him in quest of romance. The girl who owns the eye is haunted in by many dangers and is the center of operations of several international schemers. The hero saves the girl from the power of the band and solves her problem, and, of course, helps the romance to a proper culmination.

Enjoyed Trip North—
Mrs. Rudolph Harness is home again and at her post of duty with the Marksbury store. During her vacation she visited Portland, Seattle and Victoria, B. Mrs. Harness visited many of the big concerns in those cities dealing in women's wear during her trip with the sole view of studying methods in vogue.

ADVICE TO THE LOVELORN

by MRS. ELLSBURY

(Address all communications to Mrs. Ellsbury, care of News-Review.)

Dear Mrs. Ellsbury:—I am a young man of about 24, and have been in Roseburg for six months. I have met no one that I could go around with as I don't make friends easy, and I am lonely in the evenings. How can I become acquainted with the young people?

LOVELY LUKE.

Lovely Luke:—The best plan would be to attend some church, regularly. Each church has a fine group of young people, and young people's societies, and I am sure that you would quickly become acquainted and have a much better time.

Dear Mrs. Ellsbury:—I am only sixteen but I go about with boys a great deal and have for the last two years. I believe I am really in love now, and am ready to get married but the boy I am in love with has never mentioned getting married. How can I bring it up? I am sure he loves me. DOTTY.

Dotty:—You are too young and very foolish to think of getting married now. A girl of sixteen is not mature enough to be capable of real enduring love, which is the only kind a girl should have to marry. Forget such things for several years, and work to do something worthwhile.

Dear Mrs. Ellsbury:—K-r-r-rings do not look well on me. Should I wear them anyway, just because they are stylish? Flat-heeled shoes do not either, but they are being worn, so I wear them. Will you tell me what kind of a sport suit to get? IGNORANT.

Ignorant:—No, do not wear earrings if they are not becoming. If real flat-heeled shoes do not look well on you wear the medium heel in sport shoes. They are becoming to everyone. You will want a cool sport suit for August days. A crepe de chine skirt, made on a bodice, would be practical with a tailored blouse and sleeveless sweater. For the cooler September days you could wear a sweater with sleeves.

NATIONAL CATHEDRAL IS NOW BEING BUILT

WASHINGTON, August 14.—Preparations are being made today for the completion of the National Cathedral of the Protestant Episcopal church. Although four million dollars has already been contributed only the base of the great edifice on Mount St. Alban has been completed. It stands today higher than the Washington monument and overlooks the whole city. Recently, however, the Washington chapter of the church decided to push the work on the whole cathedral so that it may be completed within five years.

The National Cathedral, although started during the administration of President McKinley, is really a fulfillment of President Washington's dream of a "church for national purposes" which was provided for in the original plans of L'Enfant for the national capital. From the time that President McKinley attended the first open air services at the Cathedral every president, scores of cabinet officers and foreign diplomats and thousands of members of the senate and house have been present on historic occasions following the conclusion of the Spanish-American war to the religious services in connection with the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments.

When the last stone has been placed and the cathedral opened it will be one of the largest and finest church buildings in the world. Surrounding the foundation and apex which are now complete, are the National Cathedral School for Girls, and a similar school for boys, a bishop's house, a library which is the most complete religious library in America and an amphitheatre which today accommodates 25,000 persons.

The next mammoth ceremony to be held at the Cathedral will be a public service on September 29, in connection with the consecration of the bishop-elect of Washington, the Rev. Dr. James E. Freeman.
