WORK ON POWER LINE IS STARTED

Work has been started on the power transmission lines between Roseburg, Myrtle Creek and Riddle, according to T. H. Noss, superintendent of the Umpqua district of the California-Oregon Power company. The holes have all been dug between Riddle and Myrtle Creek and the poles will be in place in a short time. The route for the line between Myrtle Creek and Roseburg has been surveyed and marked and the actual construction of the line is being started. All materials are on hand and unless unforeseen delays occur it is expected that the wire will be up and everything in readiness for supplying power to these communities by the first of October.

THE MISFIT

By JANE PHELPS

CHAPTER XX
The luncheon over, Mrs. Crandell and Beverly went to some charitable affair. They had not invited Natalie, and, although she did not want to go, she still hurt her.
"They think I disgrace them—that I'm a misfit—a cabbage," she muttered. "Beverly Rainsford is a rose—but I'll show them!" She had been meek and quiet so long they supposed she would go on that way always.
Natalie went to the telephone, called Craig Harper and made an appointment to take tea with him the following day. She felt better. She had asserted herself, also she would find out if he cared for Beverly Rainsford. What Beverly's feelings were she cared nothing. That her blush had been caused because it was Horace's mother who had spoken to her about marrying—that she had blushed because of that, and the knowledge that she loved Horace Crandell, had thought to be cared for her until he married Natalie—Horace's wife had no way of knowing. Natalie had heard no gossip, she wasn't admitted to the confidences of the circle who talked of each other. She never had heard that Beverly's name had been linked with that of Horace. In fact, she never had heard anything about him. He had wooed and won her. "He loved him. It was Alpha and Omega."
That night she, Horace and his mother went to the theatre. It was late when they returned and she hated to bring up her failure to be in time for dinner the night before. Horace was in one of his tender, loving moods, why bring up anything unpleasant? So she let slip the chance to tell him she had had tea with Craig Harper, had lingered over it until she was late.
That afternoon she met Craig at the Ritz. In the crystal room they had tea. Natalie, scarcely knowing how to approach the subject, spoke of Beverly Rainsford having luncheon with them the day before, then said:
"And, by the way, Mrs. Crandell disposed of you."
"Disposed of me, how?"
"To Beverly Rainsford."
"Kind of her, I am sure."
"It isn't true, then?"
"What if it were?"

"Oh, nothing. I just wondered, that was all."
"But you didn't care?" His words were light, but his eyes said more than Natalie cared to see.
"Me—why—should I—An old married woman?"
"Of course you wouldn't, Natalie." It was the first time he had called her by that name.
"Come, be nice tell me if it is true?" She was determined to know.
"No, it isn't! I admire Beverly. I have known her for years. In a way I am fond of her, but she never cared for anyone but Horace—not in that way."
"Horace?" There was amazement in Natalie's voice—and something else, something very like dawning jealousy.
"Have I told you a secret? I thought everyone knew it."
"Well, he didn't care for her, evidently."
Natalie spoke as if that ended the matter as far as Horace was concerned. And why not? Anyone would marry Horace Crandell if he cared enough for them to ask them.
"They were great—chums—once. Mrs. Crandell even, jealous as she is of Horace, would have been pleased. I think, had they married."
Natalie was learning a lot. Mrs. Crandell's jealousy of Horace! That never had entered her mind—it accounted for a good many things. And she did like Beverly, showed it plainly. So Horace and that girl, one of his own set, had been great chums—her thoughts ran on.
"Why so serious?" Craig asked.
"Have I said something I shouldn't?"
"No, indeed!" Natalie was eager for more gossip.
"Are you satisfied that I am—not to be disposed of, even by your aristocratic mother-in-law?"
"Of course I am, if you say so," Natalie returned.
"Remember, Natalie," again he spoke her name, "I am heart whole and fancy free—was until I met you, you beauty."
"Come, it is time we went," Natalie spoke quickly, flushing. She was glad there was nothing between Craig Harper and Beverly Rainsford. But what he had said about Horace lingered.
Tomorrow—Horace Confronts Natalie

TUT'S LETTERS TO WOMAN LED TO TOMB'S DISCOVERY AND DIGGING UP OF BODY

By CHESTER B. BAHN
International News Service Staff Correspondent.
SYRACUSE, N. Y., Aug. 22.—Tut-anh-Amen would today still be resting peacefully in his royal tomb in the Valley of the Kings had it not been for a woman. Professor William J. Hince, of the Auburn Theological seminary told the members of the Syracuse Ministers' association all about it.
This woman, while digging in the hills back of her home at Tel-Amarna, in Egypt, a number of years ago, unearthed two queer little reels of baked clay, all covered with funny hieroglyphics. She told her neighbors about her find, and of course the news got to Cairo. The professors from the University of Pennsylvania got busy and dug up 350 of these funny little reels of baked clay, which proved to be nothing less than correspondence of King Amen-Hotep IV, who now turns out to be the father-in-law of King Tut. This led to the further search of the country for archaeological treasures.
Detailed information was also presented by Professor Hince concerning the finds of Elephantine under Moses, as recorded in the Bible, and the other, smaller one, which a hundred years ago, were the most part, however, Professor Hince finds that the results of the excavations in recent years confirm those of the Bible.
Professor Hince is forced to the conclusion that many of the legends of Hebrews from Egypt as under Moses, as recorded in the Bible, and the other, smaller one, which a hundred years ago, were the most part, however, Professor Hince finds that the results of the excavations in recent years confirm those of the Bible.

ADVICE TO THE LOVELORN

by MRS. ELLSBURY
(Address all communications to Mrs. Ellsbury, care of News-Review.)

Dear Mrs. Ellsbury: I go out with a boy that my mother approves of but she always makes me come straight in when we get home. He always wants to sit on the porch awhile, and I can't make him go. She just has a fit every time we sit out there and talk but I can't make him go home. How can I convince him that I can't stay out there?
MARCELLA: I don't think you have tried very hard to convince him that you must go in. Your mother is right about it and you should not sit out on the porch unless he has just come to call on you and you entertain him there. Simply tell him that you cannot linger on the porch or your mother will not let you go any more.
Dear Mrs. Ellsbury: How long do you have to know a girl before you give her something for a birthday? I have gone with a girl about a month and she has a birthday soon. What shall I give her?
CARL: If you have gone with her a great deal, and know her quite well it would be very nice if you gave her a birthday present. A purse, pair of gloves, book, desk set, perfume or stationery would be all right.
Returned From Newport—Mrs. C. Merrill and Misses Kathryn and Margeretta Merrill, who have been spending a vacation of a week in Newport returned home yesterday afternoon.
To Spend Several Days—Mrs. H. Wraga and Mrs. F. M. Smith of Portland arrived here yesterday to spend several days visiting.
