THE MISFIT

By JANE PHELPS

CHAPTER XXI

Natalie felt a little thrill of gladness in the fact that Craig Harper, with whom she had felt so comfortable, was not intrigued with Beverly's Rainsford. As Beverly's husband she would no longer feel free to talk to him as she did—probably would have no opportunity. Yet as she recalled what he had said about Horace, she was disturbed, wondering, Horace had been animated when talking with Beverly, seemed to like having her with them. Natalie remembered that he laughed a good deal when she was around, and that his mother made much of her. Until now an slightest feeling of jealousy because of another woman had stirred her. She had been hurt, jealous perhaps of their accomplishments, their advantages, but of them as women, women who attracted Horace, who might take him from her, she had not considered.

It made her uncomfortable. Craig said everyone knew he did not intend to marry her, had said as much to her. She could watch—Beverly was often at the house, and now that she knew she would soon find out if she had any cause for worry. Not that she distrusted Horace, but she disliked Beverly Rainsford, her perfect pale, her accomplishments, the fact that she was to the manner born, while she was a rank outsider.

While dressing for dinner Horace asked, as he often did:

"What have you been doing today, Natalie?"

"Oh, the same old things! Only I had tea at the Ritz with Craig Harper."

"Don't do it often Natalie, it might make gossip." Had her husband asked her where they met, questioned her, Natalie would have told him she had gone there by appointment with Craig. But she did not, and she did not think it of enough importance to mention. She had thought nothing wrong in making the appointment, it had been because of her desire to know if Craig was interested in Beverly. She had answered Horace's question frankly:

"I don't see why anyone should gossip because I have tea with one of my friends," she replied.

"I don't say they will. But you are very young and very pretty, Natalie, and the world is curious."

Horace returned, then talked of other things. He had made his comment in his well-bred way, no slightest sign of jealousy or irritation marked his manner. And no thought of doubt of Natalie had come to him. She was his Horace Cranford's wife, and would of course do nothing to imperil that position.

Natalie spoke of Beverly Rainsford frequently. She watched Horace's reactions to her questions. She saw nothing to disturb her and smiled to herself at being silly enough to think he cared for anyone but her.

But although Natalie loved Horace, was happy when with him, she was discontented, restless, and if the truth were told, never really comfortable in the home he assured her he loved.

She made no effort to get nearer Mrs. Cranford, although at first she had imagined that in time they would be more congenial. She kept to her own apartments save at meal time, came and went as she willed without interference. She spent money lavishly, yet that too, had lost much of its zest, although she was always becomingly groomed. But a girl of her age with no intimates, no one to enjoy with her, to admire or envy, finds spending money rather a bore.

She had not seen Craig Harper again. Now that she knew he was not to marry Beverly she could be her natural self whenever she did see him. He had called at tea time one afternoon, so Mrs. Cranford informed Horace at dinner. Beverly had also called and they had left together.

"I hope Beverly won't marry Craig," Horace said. "He isn't good enough for her. Not that he isn't all right, and I rather like him," he went on, "but Beverly should have an exceptional husband."

Natalie flushed. Why should Horace care who Beverly married? And why should she have an exceptional husband? She was no better than other girls.

The next day Natalie saw Beverly Rainsford go into Cherry's at luncheon time, and a moment afterward she stood staring at Horace's broad back as he also passed through the door.

Tomorrow—Horace's frankness—Surprising

SAGE TEA DANDY TO DARKEN HAIR

It's Grandmother's Recipe to Bring Back Color and Lustre to Hair

You can turn gray, faded hair beautifully dark and restore almost overnight a wealth of "Witch's Sage and Salsaparilla Compound" at any drug store. Millions of bottles of this old famous Sage Tea Recipe, improved by the addition of other ingredients, are sold annually, say well-known druggists here, because it darkens the hair naturally and evenly and that no one can tell a hair has been applied.

Those whose hair is turning gray or becoming faded have a surprise awaiting them, because after one or two applications the gray hair vanishes and your locks become luxuriantly dark and beautiful.

This is the age of youth. Gray-haired, unattractive folks aren't wanted around, so get busy with Witch's Sage and Salsaparilla Compound to-night and you'll be admired with your dark, handsome hair and your youthful appearance within a few days.

FOUND—A way for you to save a price of $7.50. See Harb's Tuggerly window.
