THE MISFIT

By JANE PHELPS

CHAPTER XXXII
Natalie had decided to communicate with Horace. She had seen Craig once again at the same time and place. He told her Horace was searching for her, that he had heard it through Beverly Rainford. She would write him, telling him she did not wish to see or hear from him; that as far as she was concerned he was free. She was working, and should continue to work. She wanted nothing of him. Somehow she hated to think of the dignified Horace hunting for her. And she would change her route in going home from the office and so avoid Craig Harper.

She found the letter hard to write. After tearing up several, she said: "Horace—I feel you should hear from me, as I understand you have been searching for me. Please do not try to find me, as I shall not return. I am working, taking care of myself as I did when you met me. I am no longer a 'misfit,' as your mother called me. I have left you free to do as you will. I have even discarded your name, so you have no fear of disgrace through me—what you and your mother consider disgrace."

"You never should have married me. Your mother, perhaps, was right when she said 'One can't transplant a cabbage and grow a rose.' I am contented now, shall try to be happy. I was very bitter when I left, but now I only regret that I didn't leave sooner, before we said those hard, cruel things to each other. I shall try to forget those words and remember only your kindness.—Natalie."

Natalie gave a shrug of dissatisfaction as she finished the note. She had been inarticulate with Horace for so many weeks before she left that her thoughts would not form themselves into words. Yet she had said all that was necessary. She had told him not to search for her, that she would not return, which was what she set out to do. The rest was superfluous anyway. What she had said about a "misfit," and so forth, had not been intended as a complaint against Mrs. Crandell. She had written as she had because it seemed to explain things, and had she given it thought would have supposed his mother had expressed herself to Horace as she had to Mrs. Baxter in the conversation she had overheard.

The letter arrived while Horace and his mother were at breakfast. Horace looked worn, worried. Eagerly he tore open the envelope and eagerly he began to read. His mother watched him closely. That the letter was from Natalie she was sure. He read it once, then again, this time frowning.

"What does Natalie mean, Mother? She speaks of your alluding to her as a 'misfit.'" Horace read aloud the two passages in which Natalie had referred to what Mrs. Crandell had said.

Mrs. Crandell's aristocratic lip curled slightly. She scorned denial of anything she had said or done, so now admitted the conversation Natalie had overheard.

"Poor girl," he said, as he folded the letter and put it into his pocket, telling his mother nothing more of what Natalie had written.

"Eavesdroppers never hear any good of themselves," she said. "She must have been listening, spying." "No, Mother, Natalie would never do that. She was singularly free of small vices. I am very sorry she heard you say such things about her."

"Where is she?" Mrs. Crandell asked, unable to restrain her curiosity. "She does not say, but I shall find her," Horace replied, as he rose from the table.

"You mean—you will urge her to come back?" "If I find her, yes. And if she will, I shall try to make her happier. I'm afraid she wasn't very happy here with us, that she felt lonely."

Even his resentment at what his mother had called Natalie could not make Horace speak disrespectfully. But his voice was firm. "I hope and pray he doesn't find her," Mrs. Crandell muttered when alone, "at least he is all mine now—my son."

And Horace murmured as he rode down town: "I hope and pray I may find her."

Tomorrow—Craig's Perseverance Wins

ADVICE TO THE LOVELORN

by MRS. ELLSBURY

(Address all communications to Mrs. Ellsbury, care of News-Review.)

Dear Mrs. Ellsbury: Is it proper to meet a man uptown very often, I mean a man you are not engaged to? Should you expect him to be on time to meet you, and should you wait if he is late?

MARVEL

MARVEL: If there is a good reason to prevent the man calling at your home for you, such as work until a late hour or something of that kind, it is alright to meet him up town, but if there is not, then always have him call for you. Meeting him unconventionally, unless there is a good reason lessens his respect for you. Use your own common sense about waiting if he is late. It is not humanly possible to be on time every time.

Dear Mrs. Ellsbury: I went with a boy friend all last summer. We were real nice friends, and I am plenty old enough to go with boys, and have some with them many years, but never had I liked any of them as well as this one. He comes from a respected and well known family and we liked each other fine, and always had jolly times together until a jealous old woman came between us. The boy shortly afterward went away from Roseburg. He visits Roseburg occasionally but is not going to any more. He still believes what this woman told him, because no one ever told him any different. My heart has been aching ever since he left. I know he likes me because several of his friends have told me how he told them how he likes me better than any girl. He goes with no more girls now. Could you tell me what to do. Has the time been too long, shall I let it go? It breaks my heart. Would it be right to write an apology to him?

HEART BROKEN

HEART BROKEN: There is no reason for you to write an apology, as you have done nothing to apologize for. If you wish to write a friendly little letter which would be justified by the friendship between you. You would have to touch very delicately on the trouble between you. Do not make the letter sound like an apology in any way, but as if you had thought of an old friend, and dropped him a friendly letter. If he cares to forget the trouble you will be able to tell by his answer to your letter.

JERSEY CATTLE ARE SHOWN TO BE HARDY

General Opinion That Breed Is Usually Susceptible to Tuberculosis Disproven in Report

The widespread belief among many breeders, and cattle owners generally, that Jerseys are more susceptible to tuberculosis than other breeds appears to have gotten a setback according to a summary of statistics compiled by the United States department of agriculture and recently published. In the test, which extended over a period of months, a total of 1,202,457 cattle of all breeds, including grades, were examined for tuberculosis. Holsteins led the list with 381,998 cattle tested. The number of reactors found among this breed was 29,971, or 7.35 per cent of diseased cattle among the lot. Out of the 82,824 Guernseys examined 3,444 were found to be reactors, or 4.16 per cent diseased. Ayrshires showed 4.15 per cent had tuberculosis, there being 15,972 tested, 663 being reactors. Jerseys came out of the test with flying colors, and all Jersey men were jubilant when the report was received, showing that out of the 213,889 cattle examined only 7,438 were found to be reactors, or 2.37 per cent of the animals diseased. The other breeds, totaling 467,774, showed 14,858 reactors, or a percentage of 3.64 diseased. The total of all cattle tested other than Jerseys was 888,568. Of this number 48,937, or 5.51 per cent, were afflicted. According to the report, Holsteins were found to be the most susceptible to tuberculosis, while Jerseys, generally thought to be frail and unable to stand any hardships, are credited in the report as being the most hardy. Many breeders in western Oregon have devoted little attention to Jerseys because of this general opinion, although it is acknowledged that this breed stands high in milk tests and that Jerseys require less feed than some of the larger cattle. It is also known that while Holsteins produce low grade milk, it often showing as little as 3.5 per cent butter fat, the volume of the flow overbalances the richer milk of the Jerseys, Guernseys, Ayrshires and some others, which makes them profitable to keep. The larger breeds, as a rule, are said to be less nervous than Jerseys, and strangers can handle them with less trouble. Very many people in towns who keep a family cow, which is generally a Jersey or a grade of that breed, will also duly appreciate this recent report from the department and will feel that the health of children who use the milk will not be impaired.
