Miss Kohlhaugen Wins High Honors

Of the eleven students who made a "straight A" average, the highest obtainable at O. A. C. Miss Florence Kohlhaugen daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Kohlhaugen, of Roseburg, was the only one. A portion of the facts made public by the registrar to the Corvallis Gazette Times follows:

"Corvallis students at O. A. C. 'batted high' in the spring term grade lists, just made public by E. B. Lemon, registrar. A 'straight A' average, the highest grade possible was made by 11 students of whom three were registered from Corvallis. Sixteen out of 91 students getting averages between 93 and 96 were from Corvallis. Corvallis was the only town to have more than one student in the honor group. Both lists included only students carrying 15 or more credit hours, the minimum required for regular registration, though many special students taking less than that number had high grades.

Only one 'co-ed' attained a place in the first group. This was Miss Florence Kohlhaugen of Roseburg, who won this distinction while carrying 20 credits in home economics. Miss Kohlhaugen is a senior. Most of the students who received A in their studies carried heavy schedules, 18 credits being the average."

To Bob Or Not to Bob

By HEDDA HOYT

Fashion Editor of United Press
NEW YORK, Sept. 8.—Not all women look well with bobbed hair and those who have shorn their locks only to discover this fact too late, have many sources for readjusting the hair so that it will not look bobbed.

Before bobbing the hair it is a very wise plan to purchase one of the false "bobs" and wear it several days before cutting your own hair. This will prove to you whether or not you are the type for short hair.

Faces that are over-fat seldom look well with the bobbed head-dress, as the broad "bob" has a tendency to broaden the face. Persons with high cheekbones also find short hair unbecoming.

The best way to disguise the "bob," providing one is youthful, is to part the hair from the forehead to the neckline and twist it in little knots over the ears. Braided switches held firmly to these little knots of your own hair may then be added, forming the new braided car-bun effect. Often a fringe of bang gives a coquettish effect to this hair-do and takes away the harsh line of the center part, which so few can wear. Those who hesitate to cut the hair in bangs can have adjustable bangs attached to ribbon head-bands. This is particularly attractive for evening wear.

New Sport Jaquettes

Sports jaquettes have had such a run this season that the ordinary types are no longer desirable. However, the jaquette is not to be cast aside for fall wear. Little jaquettes of suede, made on mannish lines, are among the newest of fall's sportswear. Most of these use wood shades and are unbelted, with either double-breasted or single-breasted fronts.

Again we see the sports jaquettes in the heavy homespun worked in wool cross-stitching. These, of course, are more colorful than the suede effects, since they are usually embroidered in three or more colors on pockets, cuffs and collars. Straight, unbelted lines are preferable to the tie-at-the-side models, as fall predicts tailored effects. Small head-shaped hats of homespun worked in colors to correspond with the jaquette are smart. Fall sports shoes made of crocodile leathers and lizard skins are to be seen before long. They are especially desirable for golf and country wear.

Pineapple Pudding

PARIS, Sept. 8.—In a little hotel in picturesque old St. Malo a former chef of the Rothschild family is now preparing toothsome dishes for the lucky guests who happen to run upon this spot.

"Croute a l'ananas," which is a kind of pineapple pudding, is one of his favorite desserts. He says first to fry half slices of bread in good butter. Lay them on a large serving platter. Cook as many slices of pineapple as you have toast, with enough sugar to make a thick syrup. Add a bit of lemon or orange juice and a bit of vanilla to taste.

Place a slice of pineapple upon each piece of toast and pour the sauce over it all. Serve while warm.

THE MISFIT

By JANE PHELPS

CHAPTER XXXIV

Natalie's emotions were curiously mixed as she hurried away from Horace's proximity. He was still searching for her despite her letter, else why should he go to Etta's? It was going to be hard to elude him if she remained in New York, yet she felt she must remain. She was in good position, better than she could hope to obtain elsewhere. In the small town where her mother lived there was no chance for her, and they could not afford to support her at home. But underneath there was a certain thrill of gladness. Horace cared a little for her or he would make no effort to find her. And when once again she reached her room, no thought of Craig Harper came to her, of the pleasant hour they had spent; only Horace was in her mind, and her heart cried out for him, for his love.

Impatient with herself, she finally said aloud:

"I've got to stop thinking about him. He didn't care enough to try to make me happy. His mother was the only person he really thought about. I meant nothing in that house. Oh, if we could only have had a little place like Etta's all to ourselves!" And Natalie's impatience with herself did not prevent her from crying herself to sleep. Seeing Horace had brought back very vividly thoughts of the time when he loved her, his many kindnesses.

But with the coming of another day she was able to smile grimly at her emotion. She had deliberately chosen her path, she would walk in it, and without looking back.

Horace had gone to Etta's formerly hoping he might learn something of Natalie. He missed her more and more as the days passed. He and his mother disagreed more frequently than they ever before had done. She urged him constantly to do nothing, to let people forget.

"If you'll just say nothing, do nothing for a time, you can then quietly divorce her for desertion; and no one will think anything of it," Mrs. Crandell urged.

Mrs. Crandell was not a bad woman, in many respects she was a very good one. She was generous, gave a great deal to different charities, gave of her time as well as her money. But, in her estimation, not only had Horace married beneath him, he had married a misfit, a girl who could not measure up in any particular to what a Crandell's wife should be.

She had tolerated Natalie because she must. But now that of her own free will she had left them, Mrs. Crandell could not conceive of any reason why her son should want her back. So she grew impatient when she learned he was still searching for her, that he wanted her to return. And her attitude often made Horace wonder if Natalie had had to put up with more than he had realized.

Disappointed, Horace turned from his futile ringing of Etta's door bell. With his head drooped, unseeing, he went slowly away, unconscious that she he had sought was watching him.

The very next day he went to his lawyer, Mr. Marshall.

Fortunately for Natalie's secret, Mr. Marshall was busy and Horace sent in his name with a request for a few moments' audience as soon as possible.

"It's come!" Natalie said, as she heard.

"You may go, Miss Horton," her employer said, a meaning look on his face. Natalie slipped out of a private entrance, her heart beating so madly she was sure Mr. Marshall could hear.

Mr. Marshall, while glad to have Natalie back, had more than once felt guilty because of hiring her, and had talked seriously with her about returning to Horace. But finding her determined had satisfied him self by saying:

"I suppose if she is determined to work I may as well benefit as another."

Horace was with Mr. Marshall for some time. Natalie waited in trembling anxiety until he should leave. She felt quite sure he would speak of her, even though he might have called upon other business.

She was not mistaken. Scarcely had he left when Mr. Marshall rang for her.

"I must have a serious talk with you, Mrs. Horton—Mrs. Crandell," he said. "Mr. Crandell has confided in me, yet I do not think I shall abuse his confidence if I tell you something of what he said."

Natalie braced herself to hear, and to adhere to her determination.
