THE MISFIT

By JANE PHELPS

CHAPTER XLV
Harper had said that Natalie was wheeling a young babe, and it in a way that had implied suspicion—but suspicion of what? Horace thrilled at the thought that perhaps he was a father; that Natalie, instead of his—his mother's—action—had kept her expectations to herself, not revealing her preference to him, who so wanted children. But if it were his child—his—why did Harper speak in that sneering vein? And if not his—whose?

"She was good," he said, thinking of Natalie. "It must be my child." He revealed her modesty, her wholesome independence. His faith in her came back to him, but with it an increased anxiety to find her. He hastened the street upon which Harper said he saw her, but now that she was searching for work all the morning, and striving to assist Rita in the afternoon, she did not go so far afield when she took the baby for an airing. So Horace watched in vain.

He wrote his mother, saying nothing of what Harper had told him save that he had heard Natalie was in New York, that he was searching for her.

One afternoon he ran into Beverly Batesford. He had kept away from his own and his mother's friends since his return. He had two reasons. One, he had no heart for social affairs; the other, he feared their scrutiny and their questions.

"Horace," Beverly said after greeting him had been exchanged, "will you tell me about Natalie? Have you and she separated?"

"No—" then stung by her look of sympathy, Horace told her, sparing himself not at all, but showing liberally over his mother's attitude toward his wife.

"I drove her away, Beverly. Just as easily as if I had told her to go. I was negligent, she was lonely, alone in that house. I quarreled with her, and things I would give my life to undo. The poor girl had no resources. I alone am to blame."

"Do you know where she is?" Beverly asked.

"No, I came back from Europe to find her, but haven't succeeded—yet. I shall never give up until I do."

"Naturally. Natalie never liked me, Horace, perhaps because your mother showed her preferences for me too plainly. I would have been friends with her but I didn't know how. She seemed always to repulse me—not by what she said, but by her manner. I saw her one day—I tried to catch up with her, but in some way she evaded me. I think she saw me, that she ran from me."

"Where did you see her?" Hope again springing into life.

Beverly told him, but they both decided it not much of a clue, as Natalie had been simply hurrying along the street.

"Have you questioned her friends—those she knew before you were married?" she asked.

"Before I went west, yes. Not since."

"Do so, Horace. And if I can help in any way let me know. I should like to see you happy, you and Natalie; she is too lovely to be alone, and lonely." Beverly said as she left Horace, thinking how old and worn he looked.

"If only Natalie had known Beverly wanted to be friendly it might have helped her—helped me all," Horace murmured as he watched her car disappear. Yet he felt happier after this encounter. Beverly had spoken nicely of Natalie, praised her beauty, spoke of wanting to be her friend; perhaps if it were not too late, they might still be friends—some day.

If it should be too late! This thought drove Horace Crandell almost mad. He had won the girl he loved, who loved him, then had gone his way, thinking just being his wife enough to satisfy her. She was so young and so lovely. What a fatuous fool he had been.

The life-long habit of giving his name time to his mother in the exclusion of all else had been unfair to Natalie. He recalled how she had sat apart while he and his mother played chess, scarcely speaking or being spoken to; or spending the evenings alone in her own room as they amused themselves.

If an uneasy conscience in punishment, then Horace Crandell was sorely being punished in the days he searched for his wife.

Tomorrow—Natalie decides to leave Etta's.

Hudson Bay Company, which under its agreement with the Soviet government is exploiting the fur trade of Kamchatka, the resources of the peninsula are being developed by American and Japanese capital. The former is engaged in buying furs, whaling and seal hunting while the Japanese are chiefly interested in the fisheries. The trade which the Americans have captured was formerly the monopoly of Chinese and Russian companies, but the revolution having embarrassed them, they called in American capital, which is not affected by the rigorous regulations and heavy taxation of the Soviet.

Cut off from the world, Kamchatka quickly came under the control of the rich and enterprising Americans. They created a good effect on the people and quickly come into close relations with them. The English language is heard in the furthest corners of the peninsula, and the Eskimo understands English, but has no knowledge of Russian, of which country he even has a hazy idea. Working in the Anadir-Chokhotsk district are the representatives of the larger firms of America. The whaling trade has not a single Russian ship engaged in it, and the government never exploited it while the Americans made half a million dollars a season out of it.

Liberty Theatre
The Saturday Evening Post story, by Mary Roberts Rinehart, "Mind Over Motor," will play at the Liberty Theatre tonight and tomorrow. Even if happen or motor-lunacy doesn't interest you, I am sure you will be superlatively entertained by this amazing spectacular comedy-melodrama of love, adventure and humor. Trilite Prizama, who is the highest salaried vaudeville star in this country, assumes the leading role in this marvellous, rapidly-moving production. She is ably assisted by an illustrious cast that includes Ralph Graves, Clara Horton and others.

Antlers Theatre
C. Gardner Sullivan, once's eminent scenario, writer and a bigger theme to work with than that which he embodies in "Human Vengeance," which is coming soon to the Antlers Theatre. He has given Mrs. Reily's picture everything that characterizes his other screen masterpieces, and the result is a huge success, according to the critics who "have seen the picture."

Antlers Theatre
A gang of successful, desperate crooks tried to steal the heart of a young and innocent girl violinist. Turn her into a streak and use her in their big schemes. But the girl, with nothing but her sweetness and the music of her violin, turned these crooks, male and female, into paths they did not want to go. This, in brief, is the story that Edwin Carver has turned into a powerful picture, "Mighty Lak a Rose," that is coming to the Antlers Theatre tonight.

In the cast are Dorothy Mackell, James Bennis, Helene Montrose, Sam Hardy, Anders Randolph, Paul Panser, Harry Short and about a hundred others in crook and society characters. "Jazz Broads," Scotch colloquy, must not be forgotten because "Jazz" has a very important part to play.
