THE MISFIT

By JANE PHELPS

CHAPTER LIX

"It is such a joy to direct my own household," Natalie said to Beverly Rainford, "to feel that I am really mistress of my husband's home."
"Yet many girls would be only too glad to be relieved of the responsibility," Beverly replied, "the handling of servants and the like."
"Perhaps—but they never have lived as I have; lived in a home where I was nothing but a piece of furniture, not ornamental at that. I feel so free, so absolutely content. And, Beverly, Natalie added wistfully, "I am improving, aren't I? I am becoming more fit to be Horace's wife?"

"Indeed, you are, Natalie, although I cannot agree with you that you were not fit to be his wife before. The accident of birth was all that lay between you. In every other way you were his equal. In honesty of purpose, in wisely rectitude. Naturally the little amenities of which you were ignorant troubled you, yet they are really nothing after all. Nothing that a person of character and determination cannot make their own."

Of the thought that troubled her, Natalie never spoke. It had come to her gradually, and had persisted. She had practically driven her husband's mother from her home, had made her feel that she had lost her son. She had demanded he choose, and when in her great love Mrs. Crandell had stepped aside for the younger woman, she, Natalie, had taken the gift as her right.

Horace seldom spoke of his mother to her. Natalie knew they corresponded regularly, but beyond that she knew nothing. When asked about Mrs. Crandell, she invariably said:

"She prefers to live abroad."

Natalie's return to Horace, her taking up her rightful position in society, her improved appearance, had again attracted Craig Harper to her. Natalie had been cold, almost rude to him, but he had refused to take offense, and imposed upon his former friendship for Horace to establish himself in her good graces. Only once had he referred to what had happened, then to apologize meekly, but she had ignored his apology, making no reply other than to say:

"I do not care to discuss that or anything with you."

Natalie never had received him when alone, but it was inevitable that they should meet at the homes of others. Often Natalie considered wardrobe for this society drama with the result that she displays an alluring variety of street dresses, sport togs, negligees and evening gowns.

Anties Theatre

"The Isle of Lost Ships," a Maurice Tourneur production now being shown at the Anties Theatre, is a fascinating tale of a legendary spot known to mariners as the Sargasso Sea, to which, during the ages, all manner of vessels, from the pirates' galleons that rode the Spanish main to the liner, only just reported missing by Lloyds, have been drawn.

At this strange "Island of ships," after weeks of drifting, three survivors of a shipwreck find a port. Here amid the miles of accumulated wreckage, the trio—a condemned murderer, his captor, a detective, and a young society girl—find a strange community of castaways.

These strange people lack for nothing for each new wreck brings in treasures of every description. They are ruled by an arrogant brute.

The adventures of the newcomers; the dangers they encounter, and their subsequent escape by means of an old submarine discovered among the wreckage, forms a thrilling and melodramatic plot. The cast includes Milton Sitt, Anna Q. Nilsson, Frank Campana and Walter Long.

Majestic Theatre

"Boston Blackie," starring William Russell, will be shown at the Majestic Theatre for two days starting today.
The film was adapted from the story by Jack Boyle, "The Water Cruise." It deals with the punishment of prisoners by a method as torturous as any of the refinements used during the Spanish Inquisition. The water cross advocates tied a man upright against a wall with arms outspread and then turned a high pressure hose against his midsection. This treatment tore the tissues under the prisoner's flesh and disabled him for weeks, if not permanently. Just such inhuman handling of men has caused the searchlight of the press to be thrown on the cruelties still in practice in various prisons. Each telling Horace, begging him to let Craig understand she never wished to even speak to him; but the fear that Horace might think that she had been to blame; that she had encouraged Harper's attentions in that lonely time restrained her. But she did tell Beverly, and Beverly spoke to Craig. She made him feel ashamed of himself, let him understand that she had always known Natalie to be true and good, and so tactfully that he ceased to annoy Natalie—although he persisted in trying to be friendly.

"What a dear Beverly is," she said to Horace, after Craig told her Beverly had given him a talking to. "I don't see how I ever could have disliked her."

"We often dislike people whom we do not know—and understand," Horace replied, "when if we let ourselves become really acquainted with them we would like them."

Natalie knew he was thinking of his mother, and made no reply. But what he said troubled her. Would she ever like Mrs. Crandell? Was there anything about her to win her affection—even if she knew her?

Natalie never had felt even acquainted with her husband's mother. Always she had seemed so distant, so like a person who had just crossed her path only to distress her. Of her real self, Natalie knew nothing. Often she had wondered what there was in the cold, aristocratic woman that made Horace love her, that made her friends so devoted to her. But these thoughts, these happenings were but unpleasant ripples on the surface of her pleasantly flowing existence. Most of the time Natalie was absolutely content, her days filled with overflying with interest and the love of her husband.

Natalie saw Rita often. To motor over and take her and little Natalie for a ride, to carry gifts to her namesake, gave her exquisite pleasure. Never could she forget what Rita and Clyde had done for her. Often, too, she would bring her namesake home with her, and for hours play with the child, sometimes keeping her until Horace came in, when together they would return her to her parents.

"It is wonderful to be so happy," she said to Horace. "Sweet to be so loved."

"And you have forgiven me, dear? Forgiven all the pain I caused you?" "I have forgotten everything except that you love me," Natalie smiled as she answered. "I am so happy that sometimes I am afraid."

Tomorrow—Troublesome Thoughts

community has its own penal problem to solve.

After an unusually exciting series of adventures, which include the pleasing performance of Rita Novak, Boston Blackie effects a prison reform that argues a convincing brief for humanitarian methods in American prisons.
