Redding, and this herd is thought to have ranged toward Green Mountain which is situated still further north. As is the custom with elk, according to old hunters in this vicinity who have observed their habits for many years, as the parent herd grows it will split up into smaller herds. This comes about usually, by fights on the part of the bulls, who become lealous of each other. They gradually drift apart, some of the cows following one "shiek" and some another. In this way it is only a few years until the original herd has grown into several, and these herds, in tuurn, are divided until within the course of ten years there will probably be half a dozen or more distinct herds.

In this herd of twenty-five that as seen by the stockmen there were seven or eight cows and each had a calf, then there were some yearlings
