'A WIFE'S STORY'

By JANE PHELPS

CHAPTER III

"I often wonder what Paul's principles are," I overheard father say to mother. "We really know very little about him. His legacy has allowed him to do as he pleased. He never has known the need of money."

"But he has $10,000, John," mother replied, "more ten times more than we ever have had ahead in all our married life. Surely they can get along nicely on that, with what he can earn."

"That's just it, Mary, can he earn? And if he has to, will he? I have no objections to a writing man. Some of them I understand are very successful, very hard workers. But Paul has great ideas of his ability, ideas that have so far brought him in nothing. Then, too, he has, he must have extravagant tastes. When I think of $10,000 squandered in six years it makes me shudder. Forty thousand is a fortune! I wonder what he did with it. I wonder if he has views we know nothing of."

"I hope not, for Ruby's sake. She is very much in love with him, thinks everything he says or does is right. She has always been a good girl—her influence will keep him straight."

"I hope so," father sighed as he spoke. "But a woman in love has too much faith in the man she loves to exert her influence as perhaps she might. She cannot see the need."

I moved away.

What ailed my family? Always finding something to worry about in connection with my marriage. I loved father and mother dearly, yet I resented what they said about Paul. I thought them narrow, unfair. They would talk differently when he made his big success.

I envisioned the time when they would apologize for all they had said and thought. I would be generous and not hold it against them.

One day not long afterward I again overheard a conversation, this time between father and Tom.

"Have you been able to find out anything about Paul?" father asked him.

"Nothing of any account," Tom replied. "He has been rather gay, but nothing disreputable so far as I can discover. Of course we know nothing of his life in Paris. I talked with a Harvard man who knew him in college. He was called a good fellow, a good spender."

"I can't help but wish we knew more," father said. "Ruby is so young."

I trembled with indignation. Tom had been trying to find out about Paul, playing detective. It was no business of his what Paul had done. What if he had been a little gay, spent money? Other young men did. When we were married I would help him to be economical until his book came out.

"I wish he'd buckle to and sell something," Tom returned. "I'd like to see him earn a few dollars before he marries Sis. Then ten thousand won't last him long if he spends as he has been doing."

"We can only hope for the best. Ruby is determined to have him," father spoke sadly but I was so angry with Tom for meddling I paid no attention. Because he was earning money, Tom thought no one amounted to anything unless they also did. He had no vision, could not look ahead to such a future as was bound to come to Paul.

Paul was made of finer clay. I would have to be patient until he proved his ability; but it was hard to feel they were all against him. I must love him the more to recompense.

I felt I must have no secrets from Paul, so foolishly I told him what I had overheard. If it made him uncomfortable he did not show it. I know now that it did not pierce the wall of egotism in which he was encased, that it simply made him dislike my people.

"Don't worry about money, Ruby. I'll always have it—somehow," he said lightly. "I'm not the kind that can live without money. So just forget what you hear. Your folks are old-fashioned, a bit narrow. We'll live a very different life from what you have lived with them."

Of course I was convinced that he was right. The others all wrong. Tomorrow—A Home Wedding

GERMAN 'SCOTCH' MAY INJURE BRITISH TRADE

(International News Service.) LONDON, Oct. 31.—The British whiskey export trade stands in grave danger of German competition.

According to Harper's Wine and Spirit Gazette, German exporters are offering, in London, "German Scotch" whiskey for sale at $7.50 and $2.50 respectively, for highest and lowest qualities, f. o. b. Hamburg, for the Congo and East and West Africa.

No business has yet been done, but Scotch whiskey merchants expect to be confronted very shortly with severe competition from Germany.

RADIO AND PHONE BRING NEWS OF WORLD SERIES

(International News Service.) YORKVILLE, Ohio, Oct. 31.—It is nothing new for a radio to pick up and broadcast a world's series. F. C. Shrodes, local agent for the Wheeling & Lake Erie railroad, however, performed a new stunt with his radio. He obtained the play-by-play account of the games for patrons awaiting trains in the station here by working in the other way round. He had his radio in Martins Ferry hooked up with a phone. The news came through clearly.

'I KNEW HIM WHEN' IS TICKET OUT OF COURT

(International News Service.) CHICAGO, Oct. 31.—Charlie Ray, an old-time bookie, once a familiar figure about the famous Washington Park race course, thought he'd try talking the judge out of it when arraigned on a charge of placing bets. "Judge Trade," he said, "I knew your father forty years ago and..."

"He's been dead 41 years," the court answered with a scowl.

"Well, judge, I knew someone in your family," Ray grew very nervous. He felt that the wasn't get## ting it over at all.

"I don't see much evidence against this man," Judge Trade interrupted, and added: "Discharged!"

Ray sighed.

ARIZONA CO-EDS FORCED TO BAR MODERN MAKE-UP

(International News Service.) TUCSON, Oct. 31.—Strict rules have been laid down by upper classwomen for the freshmen girls of the University of Arizona. Under these rules freshmen girls must wear green ribbons from 1 a. m. to 8 p. m. except Sundays; they are not allowed to wear rouge or jewelry and are not permitted to carry powder puffs or compacts.

TO A NATURE LOVER

The following poem by Alden Harness has been accepted by the compilers of "An Anthology of Oregon Verse," who are using published and unpublished poems, and it shall be included in their book:

When tender blossoms, blue and gold,
That star the fertile, dark green sod,
Shall to thy mind and heart unfold
The secret manuscripts of God,
Thou shalt behold the land and skies
With brighter beauty glorified,
For angel hands before thine eyes
Shall draw the mystic veil aside.

When on the plain, some summer day,
Thou shalt commune with sun and breeze;
When on the mountain, far away,
Thou shalt companion rocks and trees;

To higher truths, that bring thee light
Kind Nature shall become thy guide,
Thou seest with deeper sight
The mystic veil drawn aside.

When thoughts of thine to God above,
The one supreme and only Cause,
Are wafted on the wings of love
With understanding of His laws
The holy peace that crowns thy brow
Shall ever in thy heart abide,
Forever and forever now
The mystic veil is drawn aside.

—Alden Harness,
Roseburg, Oregon.
