'A WIFE'S STORY'

By JANE PHELPS

CHAPTER XV

It was nearly dinner time when Tom appeared. Paul came in a few moments later. Neither talked much, and I too was unusually silent, feeling the tension.

After dinner they went out on the porch while I cleared away. I worked quickly, anxious to join them. As I went to them I heard their voices in angry dispute. Unconsciously I halted.

"It's none of your damn business if I do gamble!" Paul said. "I suppose you'd prefer your sister should starve. You narrow minded people make me disgusted. Better men than you gamble."

So this was the source of our income, the reason why Paul had money spasmodically. Like most girls, brought up as I had been, I looked upon gambling with horror; and gambling as a profession was unthinkable. Now Tom was speaking:

"That may be Paul; I'll not contradict you. I never set up for a saint. But aside from the moral question, what a way to support a family. You, a man with a college education, travelled, refined, making gambling a profession. If Ruby knew it would nearly kill her."

"Suppose you tell her and see," Paul sneered.

"Then there are your children. Can't you see you are ruining their prospects, their lives, if this becomes known? Do quit it, Paul. Find something decent to do, if it's only driving a delivery cart. If you'll let me I'll stay and help you find something." Tom's voice was very earnest.

"Can't you understand I have to have money? I'm not the sort of man who can grub along on a few dollars a week. I wasn't brought up as you were, remember. My people had money." Then in a more conciliating voice: "See here, Tom, what's the use grouting? I am looking about for something good, but until I find it we have to live. I may land a good job any day."

"But you don't always win, do you?" Tom asked.

"Of course not! But I win oftener than I lose. If I had money enough to play as I should I'd be on easy street."

"But you're not—and you are in debt. Isn't this true?"

"No more than I can handle. Everyone runs bills nowadays. We seem to get along fairly well, don't we? This is a snug little home. Ruby and the children want for nothing. I suppose she has been complaining."

I waited anxiously for Tom's answer.

"No, Ruby has not complained. She would not. But I have eyes. I can see her efforts to economize, her poor unfashionable clothes, and she has no maid, does everything, even the washing."

"As long as she doesn't complain I don't see as it is any of your business." Paul was becoming angry again. "If you are anxious to worry her, go tell her you have meddled with my affairs; that you disapprove of me; that I gamble, and that you, with your Puritanical ideas, your country code, think I am going straight to the devil and taking her with me."

"No, I shall not tell her. Let her remain in her fool's paradise as long as she can, poor girl." Tom sighed heavily.

I crept softly away. Tom would not tell me. I never would let either of them know I had heard, knew that I knew. But the shame of it! My handsome, educated husband a common gambler because he was too indolent to work. That, I knew, was the real cause. I had no illusions left, or very few of them. Paul was lazy. Never having been obliged to work, he had lost the inclination. It was his indolence that had kept him putting years over his book; he had used his writing as a blind.

For a few moments I remained in my darkened room facing the future; it looked dark, forbidding. But I must keep up my courage, must not give way. I must think of the children. Paul would not, I knew.

When I joined Paul and Tom on the porch, after making a noisy entrance, they were talking of the new house Tom was building for a manufacturer out home. I joined in the conversation, scarcely knowing what I said, not hearing them. In my mind rang Tom's words:

"It would nearly kill Ruby if she knew."

MOVIES

Liberty Theatre

Just before he began work on "Peaceful Peters," first of the Arrow-William-Fairbanks series, which will be shown at the Liberty Theatre tomorrow and Saturday, Director Lewis King bought himself a bright and shiny new automobile which was the joy of his heart. But it was written in the stars that his joy was to be short-lived. One of the first scenes in "Peaceful Peter" calls for a thrilling horseback chase and Director King was up in the front seat of his nice new car, whooping like a Comanche Indian, as the riders peeted helter-skelter toward him, obeying his sheltered commands. Near and nearer they came, the horses straining every nerve, their riders flinging them on to efforts even more intense, while the camera men ground away as though their lives depended on it. Then suddenly one maddened bronch, instead of swerving as he reached the car—which was what his rider strove to make him do—crashed headlong into it—and a very large number of good American dollars took wing! All that remained behind was a shattered car, a saddler and wisecracker pony, a frenzied director and a scared crew of assistants and cameramen.

Addie

ADDIE: It would be wise to go to the Y. M. C. A. or small hotels for business girls, only, where she could stay until she obtained permanent lodging. Yes, expert typists are in demand, but she would have to have enough money to allow for several weeks or a month of changing positions and finding work. There are numerous night schools in every city where bookkeeping, office management, secretarial work, and many other things beneficial to a business girl may be learned.

Antlers Theatre

In "Stepping Fast," the latest William Fox picture which stars Tom Mix at the Antlers tonight, the action starts in the ruins of the cliff-dwellers who formerly lived in the Arizona desert. Mix plays the role of a young cowboy who goes to the aid of a scientist when he is attacked by three men. After driving away the attackers, the stranger tells the ranchman that he holds the secret of a hidden gold mine which a band of international criminals are trying to locate. The scientist dies and wills the cow boy a half interest in the mine and tells him that his daughter in China is to own the other shares. This incident starts a series of thrilling adventures which carry the rancher across the Pacific to Hong Kong and back again to the Arizona mine. Claire Adams plays the lead-
