Uncle Joe Cannon Watching Life's Sunset in the Placid Calm Among Home Folks

(United Press)

LOS ANGELES, Nov. 29.—Quitting the European imperial presidential candidacy part in the life today of Cannon, Danville's Grand old man retired last night to his public life after 50 years.

That most concern Uncle Joe's chances of filling his place in the White House.

Uncle Joe Cannon belongs in a past era. For him the sun is nearing the horizon. It is not the friends of the heyday of his career who greet him now on the streets—it is their sons and grandsons.

His attitude toward life and the affairs of the world is best described by the one word, "detached." He does not dwell in the past, nor does he speak much of it, unless the subject is brought up in his presence. Neither does he talk of the affairs of the state, the nation or the world, unless pressed, and then he is apt to dismiss the subject with a few words.

Uncle Joe keeps in touch with affairs by reading the daily papers morning and night. He daily visits his bank, the Second National, and spends an hour, maybe two, with the officers and directors, even stops and chats with the humblest patron.

He walks to and from his home to the bank without assistance, despite his 87 years. He carries a cane, but the stick is yet subservient to his will.

Uncle Joe arises at 8 o'clock in the morning, breakfasts leisurely, reads his still voluminous correspondence and the morning papers and then walks to the bank. Frequently he returns home before lunch. In time to enjoy a game or two of dominoes, of which he is quite fond, with members of his family. After luncheon he enjoys a ride in his automobile, almost daily going out in the country to a flowing well and securing a supply of drinking water for the home.

He partakes of dinner at night with the members of his family and reads the evening papers, after which, if no friends have dropped in for a chat or a game of cards, he enjoys his radio outfit. He still enjoys his radio outfit, but still curses fluently when a bedtime story gets switched on in place of the expected concert number.

Attends Quaker Church

Occasionally Uncle Joe drives on Sunday to Annapolis, Ind., 50 miles away, his boyhood home, and attends the quaint old Quaker church. It was his father's church, really located at Bloomington, a mile from Annapolis, but no longer is he greeted by the bearded men who played with him as a boy. It's their sons and grandsons who shake hands with him and inquire after his health.

He still recalls with interesting anecdotes the straggling days as a young lawyer at Shelbyville, Ind., where he practiced for a year without receiving one cent from a client, and from where he went to Tuscola, because he had no money to pay his railroad fare further.

Uncle Joe's leisure hours are spent the right of property."

And these old cronies remark the morning after that Uncle Joe apparently has lost none of his skill in poker which he acquired during his 50 years in Washington, when many a vital question of national importance was discussed and settled over a hotly contested game of poker.

Orville Swearingen, who has been in the hospital at North Bend with a broken leg came up to Elkton Saturday for a visit.

Mr. Edward Grubbe and daughter, Refa, and Cordelia Butler went to Eugene to the big football game between U. of O. and O. A. C.

Dale and Buck Swearingen, from Drain, were seen on the streets of Elkton Tuesday.

Misses Meta and Ruth McNeil spent the day in Roseburg with Chas. Clemens.

Mrs. Arthur Clemens is in Roseburg with her young son, Johnny, who has heart disease.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Grubbe left for Reedport today to spend Thanksgiving with his brother, Mr. Roland Grubbe.

The citizens of Elkton held a road meeting the 24th of November, and voted a 7½ mill tax.

Mr. Bowman and sons, Lester and George Bowman, are expected home today after a very long absence.

The E. U. H. S. basketball team is expecting to play Youcalia on the afternoon of December 8. They are also intending to play Drayn sometime in the near future.

In his capacious library, from the walls of which framed photographs, autographed, of Roosevelt, Cardinal Gibbons, Ambassador Jusserrand and other noted friends of other days smile down at him. The walls are also decorated with the original drawings of dozens of cartoons, most of which show Uncle Joe with his famous long black stogie.

In connection with his famous stogie, it is interesting to know that Uncle Joe has quit the use of tobacco and coffee, two articles he has used all his life. He gives no reason for becoming a total abstainer; simply says he quit because he didn't see where they were benefiting him any.

Uncle Joe has no comment to make on the presidential situation. He says he simply doesn't care who runs, providing he is a good republican. He is still sought for advice and favors and a contemplated removal of the United States marshal's office from Danville to East St. Louis has been held up pending the final word from Uncle Joe. But, all in all, Danville's famous statesman is living a life of ease and retirement, viewing life and the world from the sidelines in a detached manner.

For Uncle Joe, life is no longer an onward and upward journey. Its course is now downward, its pathway as placid as loving relatives and friends can make it.
