'A WIFE'S STORY'

By JANE PHELPS

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Ruby Atkins marries Paul Norwood, somewhat of a dilettante, who at 25, has dissipated a fortune. There are two children, Joan and Laura. Ruby discovers her husband is egotistical, non-dependable, but loves him. Norwood claims to be entitled to wealth, but is disinclined to work for it. He introduces Dave Logan, whose reputation Ruby is warned against. War is declared, Norwood goes abroad. He leaves debts. Ruby, with the children, moves into town, finds work and struggles alone for five years. Paul returns and insists upon their moving in to better quarters. Dave Logan reappears and becomes the family's "good angel." Joan comes home intoxicated from a tea dance. Paul and Dave Logan add to Ruby's perplexities by making light of the law of prohibition. Finances improve; debts no longer trouble Ruby, but Paul, as always, refuses to take his wife into his confidence, or tell the source of his income. Says he is in the export and import business. Logan sows seeds of distrust in Ruby's heart.

CHAPTER XLIII

Paul talked more and more about buying a home in the country, or if he were not able to make terms, to rent.
"I want to get near the water," he said and the girls, excited at the prospect talked continually of the new idea. Joan, who at first had not favored the project, enthused as much as Laura when her father told her she could have her young friends for week ends; that she could go in to town when she wished.

I did not take the talk seriously however. I knew we were more comfortable that we had been since the first years of our marriage, that we had more money to spend, and were free of debt. But to buy or rent a large house—such as Paul talked of—up in Westchester, or on Long Island seemed impracticable to me.

Paul's absence from home grew more frequent, lasted longer. Occasionally he appeared nervous, full of anxiety, but usually he was complacent when at home, often remarking that a well-filled pocket book made life worth living. So I took his restless, seemingly anxious spells, as something unavoidable to a man in business and said nothing to him about them, trying instead to divert his mind and so give him rest.

I continued to be anxious about Joan, although there had been no repetition of the one distressing incident. She had grown more quiet, sensitive, but as she did nothing openly defiant, I hoped she was growing wiser as she grew older, and that the other had been a passing stage caused in part by her rebellion because of our circumstances, our drab way of living. In this secretiveness she was like her father, as he was in other ways. I tried in every way to combat it, to gain her confidence, but with indifferent success.

I had time now to read and somewhere had seen it said that it was usually a mother's fault if her daughters turned out badly, that she should make herself a companion to them, sharing their joys as well as their sorrows, that a young girl needed comprehension of her love of gaiety, a sharer of her delight in simple pleasures, a careful watchfulness of all her comings and goings, a supervision of the friends she made.

But it was almost impossible to penetrate to Joan's real feelings, her actions. I had let her see my disapproval of Clem Sanders and other friends she had made, not too tactfully I am afraid, and now she adopted the attitude that as long as she home at a proper time, what she did otherwise was her own affair—the same attitude Paul always had taken toward me.

We had acquired a piano, also a victrola, and I urged her to bring her young friends home, to entertain them there instead of going out. But almost invariably after an hour, someone, often Joan, would propose going elsewhere to finish the evening, and the group would troop off to a motion picture show, or some dancing place, leaving me almost discouraged. Laura was my unfailing comfort. She never cared for the gay life her sister craved, yet she loved and admired Joan, looked up to her as almost perfection. She worshipped beauty, and her sister's loveliness made her overlook her faults. Always ready to give up to her in the matter of clothes or pleasures, she realized nothing of that selfish nature that was willing always to take, never to give.

"I am so plain. Mother, no one notices what I wear," she would say, when the matter of a new gown or hat came up. "Let Joan have it if there isn't money enough for two." And had I allowed it, Laura would have been a Cinderella, save that she smiled, happy in her sister's happiness, joyous in her beauty, instead of sitting by the fire, weeping.

Laura wasn't really plain, just a sweet, pleasant-faced girl whom everyone liked, yet gave no particular notice. She read a good deal, studied her music and was generally useful. Just one of thousands of girls like her who are neither beautiful nor brilliant, and who are passed over for girls who have those attributes.

I loved my quiet little daughter tenderly, but I did not appreciate her—I now know.

ADVICE TO THE LOVELORN

by MRS. ELLSBURY
(Address all communications to Mrs. Ellsbury, care of News-Review.)

Dear Mrs. Ellsbury: Christmas is troubling me now. I hope you can help me. I want to give the lady my husband works for a present. She is in the store all the time, and is well off, and has everything a woman could wish in her home. What could I give her?
GRACE:

GRACE: People like that are indeed hard to buy articles for. But it is surprising how many well furnished homes do not have good looking table mats. Those Dutch silver table mats they are showing this year are beautiful, and I feel very confident that she does not have them. I have never seen a home that really had enough candlesticks or pieces of cut glass. Another unusual gift that is very useful, is a jamnet, with a spoon and a silver cover. You will find that very few people have them, and they are excellent for serving jam when giving a dinner. If she plays bridge, she can never have too many bridge sets, or table covers.

Dear Mrs. Ellsbury: I am 20 years old, and engaged to a man that I am not sure I love. He says he is a ringer, and I took it but now I am not sure that I love him, and want to marry him. What shall I do? Sometimes I think I want to, and then again I don't. Then I think of just quitting him entirely. I wouldn't like to do that either, and I just don't know what to do.

MARY ANN: Don't do anything just at present, but wait a year before you talk of getting married. During that time, I am sure that you will decide just what you want to do. If you still feel uncertain at the end of that time, I would advise you to go away for a time. Sometimes when absent, it is easier to make up one's mind.

SCHOOL CHILDREN HELP STOP MOTOR ACCIDENTS
(Associated Press)
SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 18—One thousand public school boys of San Francisco, from 12 to 18 years old, have been organized into a traffic reserve force. Like the regular traffic policemen they are posted on the corners surrounding schools, where they regulate the progress of automobiles and see that their fellow students cross the streets safely. They study the city ordinances and are drilled in signals by traffic officers of the police department.
