

And YOU Pay the Selling Cost!

It costs less to sell a standard commodity than one which is not standard; it costs less to sell few varieties than many; it costs less to sell large quantities than small quantities. It costs less to sell to a steady customer than to an irregular customer.

Sounds Sensible, Doesn't It?

When you buy from us you are doing all of those things; and you get the benefit. When you buy from a non-cooperative dealer he gets the benefit. "Let's make it a million in two more years." We can do it easy if you all help.

'A WIFE'S STORY'

By JANE PHELPS

CHAPTER LXII.

For just a moment I left my dead, and went up to Laura. I made her lie down after her bath, and in a moment she was sleeping the sleep of exhausted youth. I kissed her pale cheeks, drew the shades and returned to Joan.

My wish for Paul's return, had become almost unbearable. I must find him.

"Where are you Paul?" I cried aloud just as the door opened and he stood on the threshold, blinking at me in the darkened room.

I started to rise, to go to him, but my limbs refused to move and I sat staring numbly as he came slowly toward me—then stopped, exclaiming:

"My God, Ruby! What has happened?" Even then I could neither move nor speak. He came beside me, leaned over the still form, buried his face in his hands, and groaned.

"When—how?" he asked hoarsely.

"Yesterday," I answered dully, then the realization that he was with me, that I was no longer alone, swept over me and I flung myself into his arms, while we wept together. When we became calmer I told him how she was found.

"Oh, why was I away? Poor Ruby!" he smoothed her hair.

I had not made up my mind to let him see Joan's note to me, but suddenly there crept over me a feeling that my darling's death might not be in vain if it proved the regeneration of the other father. Not one thought of the Revenue men, had come to me now this morning appeared very near. I left Paul bowed over the still form and going to my room got Joan's pitiful last message and, returning quietly placed it in his hand.

His eyes widened with horror as he read.

"She did it—purposefully," he groaned.

"Yes, Paul. But no one save you and me must ever know," I took the paper from his nerveless hands, pressed any lips to the page, then tore it into tiny bits. "It would kill Laura," I added.

He held his hands, Paul groaned aloud.

"Tell me," he said after a while, "about this, what Sanders said."

I repeated the conversation, just as I heard it.

"It wasn't because she took a drink now and then. It was because of me, what I am," he said huskily. "My God! How can I bear it!"

It was my turn now to comfort. Paul was shaken to his very soul.

"By turning over a new leaf, Paul. She said it might make you understand," you know. Then I pleaded with him as I had never pleaded before. By the side of our dead daughter's side I told him of the visit of the Revenue men, of Joan's humiliation, her fears, I said not a word of my own terror, but pleaded with him not to ruin Laura's life. He answered never a word, but with his head in his hands, sat quietly, occasionally moaning.

I left him there while I telephoned to Evelyn Markham. As I knew she would, she promised to come at once, and a couple of hours later was with me. I told her only what the men had told me, and her sweet sympathy, her tactful assumption of all necessary details, helped me bear up. On the morrow all that was mortal of Joan would be laid to rest in the cemetery.

Paul sat beside Joan all day, refusing to leave until we dressed her for her last sleep. No one should touch my darling but myself, so with Evelyn's help we made her ready, while Paul locked himself in his room and Laura slept.

As I have said before, I thought I had borne all that it was humanly possible to bear. Surely now my cup was full and running over. Yet more was to come—was already rapping at the door.

I had started up the stairs to ask Paul to come and look at Joan, now that she was dressed for the last time, but I halted as I heard the honk-honk of a motor.

"I can't see anyone," I called to Evelyn.

"You shan't Ruby. I shall see you aren't disturbed," she replied just as the door-bell rang an insistent peal through the quiet house.

Tomorrow—A warrant for Paul's arrest.
