'A WIFE'S STORY'

By JANE PHELPS

CHAPTER LXV

I was fearful of what Paul might do with nothing to occupy his mind. His depression was intense, his humiliation complete. I begged him not to allow himself to be discouraged; we would begin all over again, and this time start right. But it was with a heavy aching heart that I set about what I had to do.

Helped by Evelyn and George Markham, I rented my home, furnished. Then Laura and I moved into a tiny cottage near them. I feared Paul would object to going back to the old neighborhood, the place where we had cut quite a dash when first married. But I felt I must be near Evelyn, and the place was so cheap that we could manage to live on what we got for rent of our home, and also keep up the interest on the mortgage. It had taken about all I had saved to pay it off to pay Paul's fine.

When I told Paul what I had done he said nothing either for or against it. He was so detached, so listless. I was frightened and went to Evelyn with my fears. She was silent for a while, then said:

"Paul used to write. Has he done anything along that line lately?"

"No, not for years," I replied. "Take him paper and pencils, a lot, when next you go to him. Tell him to try to write something no matter what. It will occupy his time. Other men have written in prison, done good work—O. Henry, for instance. Try to arouse his ambition to help you."

I was at once intrigued with her idea. Long ago I had urged Paul to try writing short articles, and I believed he had lost none of his power of expression. He might come back in this way.

On my next visit I carried him paper and pencils and, saying nothing of any remuneration from his work, told him I thought it would help pass the hours if he could scribble.

"I have nothing to write about," he replied.

"Oh, yes, you have!" I returned. "You have kept up with the times; you have had experiences of all kinds. Try putting some of them on paper. It will amuse you."

So I left him, and when next I visited him I saw the pile of paper had decreased, but he had destroyed what he had written. I made him promise he would let me see what he had done the next time I came, and left him a bit encouraged.

George Markham was interested when I talked with him. "Bring what he writes to me. If it is good enough I think I can place his stuff. I have a friend who is manager of a syndicate."

The weeks passed and Paul had done nothing I could show to George. Yet he was different, not quite so depressed. I spoke of writing syndicate copy. His face brightened a bit, and then I told him that George Markham had faith in him. So started was I at the glow that came into his eyes, the expression of his face, that I stared at him, scarcely believing anything I had said could cause the change.

"You mean that Markham, after all that has happened, still has faith in me—believes that I can come back? He never liked me."

"He has faith in you, Paul."

"If I only had faith in myself," he said turning away.

I was building my hopes on no will-o-the-wisp so far as Paul's ability was concerned—if he would apply himself. I knew his ability to write, his short pregnant sentences with just the right punch in them, his facility of expression. I said something of the kind, reiterating Markham's belief in his talent for the sort of work demanded by syndicates; then, my time being up I left him, more encouraged perhaps than I had reason to be.

I was not well. Joan's tragic death, my anxiety over Paul, the effect his wrong-doing would have on Laura, the work necessary in attending to the breaking up of our home, all had told on me. Paul had spoken of it, said I looked badly.

"I shall keep up until you can take the responsibility," I told him. "then I shall rest." Not once had I spoken of failure, of doubt. If at times my soul faints within me, only my God knew it.

Paul had been three months in prison, his time was half served, when he gave me several sheets of paper.

"After the warden passes on them you can show them to Markham," he said frowning. "They may be worthless."

He had done a few short articles, pungent, delightfully expressed, clever little satires that made me smile or sigh as I read them. With my heart beating fast with hope and pride I took them to George Markham.

JEWETT MILL MAY BE OPENED IN NEAR FUTURE

SPECIAL stock farm and saw-mill proposition. We are offering for 30 days 1775 acres, partly fenced, 130 acres tillable, balance pasture and timber. Two houses and one barn, 6x50. This is an ideal stock and sheep proposition, 640 acres of timber, approximately six million feet of timber. One and one-half miles from the Coast Bay highway, seven miles from Dillard, two miles from school and church. This is certainly a special buy at ten dollars per acre. Plenty of good water. Terms: One-half cash and balance on long time with low rate of interest. See N. Rice of RICE & RICE.

J. T. Gaskill, formerly of Byrley, Idaho, who has made several business visits to Roseburg in the past several months on Monday told a Courier representative that a deal is pending at Eugene whereby the Jewett mill at Gardiner is to be leased and in operation within a few days, says the Roseburg Courier.

According to information given by Mr. Gaskill a company composed of Harvey Hadley, a Mr. Johnson from Eugene, and himself, was to take over the property and commence operating it shortly.

He stated that Mr. Johnson of Eugene experienced sawmill man, is to be in charge and that Harvey Hadley, known locally, is to assist. Mr. Gaskill stated that although a member of the firm, he would not take active part in the affairs of the mill, as operated.

Mr. Gaskill stated that the new company is as yet undecided as to where logs will be cut, but that there is an available supply from three to five miles from the mill.

Gardiner officials of the mill company expressed no knowledge of the deal which is pending, except that Mr. Hadley and some associates has been discussing leasing the property. The matter of available log supplies has been deferring the deal, Gardiner officials say.

SKIFFS EXONERATED

A decree handed down in the circuit court of Marion county, by Judge Bingham, exonerates Mark S. Skiff and son of Salem, of charges of fraud brought against them by The Willamette Grocery Company, which also included the First State and Savings Bank of Roseburg because of a judgment held against the Skiffs by the bank. The elder Skiff decided a parcel of land to his son, it being claimed by the plaintiff that this was done to defraud creditors following the action of the Roseburg bank in obtaining a judgment. The court found that the property was deeded as a gift to the son before the judgment was obtained.
