'A WIFE'S STORY'

By JANE PHELPS

THE HOPE THAT SPRINGS ETERNAL

Chapter LXVI.
George Markham placed Paul's articles with a prosperous syndicate, making a very good contract. I was more than delighted. While I knew they had merit, were clever and interesting, I had no idea they would bring in so much. It was a living for us, added to the excess of our home rent over what we paid.

When I told Paul and showed him the contract signed by George Markham as his attorney, and told him what the editor had said in praise of his work, he just crumpled up, and cried like a baby.

"It doesn't seem true, Ruby," he said when he became calm. "I don't deserve it, don't deserve such luck. If only Joan could know!"
"She does, dear. She believed her going would help you." Then I told him of the study Laura and I had fixed up for him in our new home, a tiny room upstairs where he could have perfect quiet in which to write.

"It won't be long, and we must not be sorrowful for Laura's sake. You will do even better work under the stimulus you have received."
I was right. Each week Paul's work improved. My old pride in him revived, and I felt no uneasiness in facing the future. Paul was a changed man, not only outwardly this hair had grown gray, and there were fine lines in his face not there before his arrest, but the inward change was even greater. He was humbled. All his false pride was gone, all his egotism. George Markham had visited him often, encouraging him in every way, and proving his wish to be friendly, while Evelyn was often with him helping me by her belief in Paul's comeback.

When I thought of how I had flouted the advice of these two dear people, I felt ashamed, remorseful. Who was I, with my lack of knowledge of the world, to set their well-meant advice aside? I had married too young, insisting upon having my own way, thinking I knew more than my parents, and had reaped the result of my obstinacy—not that even now I regretted marrying Paul. I never had ceased to love him. But had I made him wait for me, prove himself, I might have saved both him and myself years of agony.

ARTISAN'S ATTENTION
All United Artisans and their friends are invited to a "room and eat sociable meeting" next Wednesday night, Jan. 16th, at 8 o'clock in Macomber Hall. There will be music, refreshments and lots of fun. A representative from Portland will be present.

One morning the paper held black headlines.

Dave Logan had been killed in a wild ride with a well-known woman of the town. He had been drinking, and drove his car off an embankment. There followed the story of his life, a story of immense wealth quickly made, of riotous living, of entanglements. Again I felt humbled. This was the man whom I had made my friend despite the warnings I received, despite my own distrust of him.

My mistakes had been many, my humiliation great. But now I, too, like Paul, was humbled. My sorrows, my great troubles had given me a different viewpoint, and made me realize that in many ways I had been as culpable as Paul. I had not insisted upon my right as a wife to know of his affairs, had been too weak to be a helpmeet to the man I married. But the past was over and done with. The future belonged to us, to make of it what we would in honesty of purpose, in perfect confidence, in hope.

It is June, 1923. Paul is with us. Every day he spends hours working in the little studio Laura and I prepared for him. He is quietly, but trying to think, not unhappily, retrieving the past. He seems to have lost all desire for money as money, and to think only of accomplishment, of making me and Laura comfortable, and as happy as we can be with thoughts of our lost Joan ever with us.

But Time is a kind healer. Daily we are growing more reconciled, and now we plan for Laura, the child who never has been anything but a comfort, who has borne our sorrows, been the sharer of our troubles. And as I see the daily strengthening of Paul's character the feeling that some day people will forget and forgive comes over me. And I know that in some way, some how, we shall achieve that elusive thing—Happiness.

For at last there is perfect confidence between us, perfect faith and trust. And without this there is no happiness in marriage.

Till END.

NOTE: The foregoing is a true story in every important detail, as told me by the "wife." Naturally, the names of characters and places are changed.—Jane Phelps.

ROSEBURG GIRLS DEFEATED

The girls of the Roseburg high school were defeated by a score of 23 to 9 in their game with the girls of Grants Pass Saturday evening. The Grants Pass girls were much larger and heavier than the locals, and in addition to being on their home floor, were all more experienced in the game, so that the local girls were out classed from the start, although they put up a game fight and worked hard against the handicap.
