The Revelations of a Paid Companion

By JANE PHELPS

Author of "My Husband and I," "A Wife's Story," etc.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Rita Hall at 16 loses both father and mother in an accident. She is left penniless and accepts a home with her father's half sister in Los Angeles. Aunt Agatha gives Rita a home but denies any youthful pleasures. Upon her death she leaves all her possessions to a common fellow, Jim Bond, the son of an old sweetheart. Rita answers an advertisement for a traveling companion and secures the position. She is engaged by a Mrs. Ellwood who has a nephew, Barton Ellwood, whose bold admiration Rita dislikes. Then, just as she is about to leave to take her position, Bond shuffles in and proposes marriage. Rita scornfully refuses. She leaves and meets others of the Ellwood family. Guy, Mollie and Mr. Ellwood. Rita adapts herself to the regime of the household and is asked to remain.

Chapter XIII

The day Mrs. Ellwood paid me my month's salary I kept my resolve and spent it all for clothes, retaining but a little silver for some emergency. I tried to be sensible in my purchases, but it was hard work to remember that dainty frilly delicate things were not appropriate for one in my position.

"Necessities first," I told myself, "then perhaps I will have some of the others." So I purchased a dark blue dress of good lines but simply made, with dainty white collars and cuffs of sheer lawn to set it off. That blue was my color, that it would be becoming made it easier to pass by the more elaborate things shown me.

I bought shoes and stockings, some underwear and a hat, a close fitting toque of dark blue to match my dress. I would have to wait another month for a coat, and a dainty kimono that I coveted.

"You look charming in your new dress, Rita. You have shown excellent taste," Mrs. Ellwood told me. Guy Whistled, under his breath when he passed me in the hall, then said saucily:

"Fine feathers make fine birds. I was just about to go in and ask mother who the charming visitor was when you turned around."

"I'm sorry my face spoiled the effect," I replied laughing.

"Spoiled it! I won't tell you what I think. I would make you vain."

My vain. I smiled drily when in my room at the idea. I had nothing to make me vain. Yet I couldn't resist a glance in the mirror. I did look well. My dress was becoming and my little encounter with Guy had flushed my cheeks, brightened my eyes. I was unused to compliments.

"Now you look as if you really belonged," Mollie said, "and I'll tell the world you needed a new dress. I've had all I could do to keep from telling you you looked—well, a back number."

"I know it, Mollie," she had insisted. I call her so. "But I couldn't get anything until my month was up."

"Why didn't you say so? Mother would have advanced your pay, or I would have loaned it to you."

"I would rather have waited to earn it," I replied, thanking her.

"You're a queer one, just a young girl and with such strange notions. By the way I'm going out tonight with Larry Ward, but don't let on to mother. She doesn't like Larry, thinks him too fast. Poor mother, she is just about 20 years behind the times. She thinks a girl should act as she did when she was young. It's a joke the way she feels about us nowadays, thinks we are going straight to the devil—even if she doesn't say so. And there's no use of her knowing too much of what I do. It only worries her."

I felt this a warning. That I was not to mention Mollie's movements. As I was there only in the capacity of companion to her mother, I thought the warning rather foolish. It was none of my affair what the daughter did.

I was with Mrs. Ellwood when her husband came in. He said nothing but I felt his approving glance. It pleased me more than anything the others said. He was a quiet man usually, always absorbed in something. But he was a very splendid and thoughtful man, and never failed to speak graciously to me.

When I first saw him I thought him older than he seemed now that I knew him. Yet I was surprised when Mollie told me he was but 45. "Dad and mother married when they were awfully young," she said. "If I should say I was going to marry Larry or anyone they'd have a fit, and I'm as old as mother was, and dad wasn't much older."

Why 45 isn't old at all I thought, and really Mr. Ellwood didn't look old. It had been his quiet, dignified manner made me think so. I liked them all, parents and children, yet I felt there was something wrong—something wrong somewhere. Was it Mollie? I wondered. I knew her mother was troubled, that Guy's eyes often followed his sister with half pitying, half-angry expression. Only Mr. Ellwood seemed unaware of any tension, and he saw little of Mollie, really very little of the family. A few moments with his wife at dinner with Mollie and Guy, from which they often hurried away to the theatre or some social function, while he spent the evening in the library until time to spend the night half hour with his wife before she slept.

ENGLAND WILL RECOGNIZE SOVIET

(Associated Press Leased Wire.)
LONDON, Jan. 30.—The Daily Herald says this morning that no hitch whatsoever has developed in the government's preparation to recognize Soviet Russia, that the matter has already been decided and reports to the contrary deliberately misrepresent the ministry's intention.

This does the laborite newspaper seek to ally what it describes as a good deal of impatience in the labor ranks about the impending recognition.

It attributes the attacked willful misstatements to the conservative and liberal newspapers and expresses surprise that the labor people should
