Waters Devoid of Life

Deserts are usually considered as waterless, but there is a large area of the sea itself which some scientists believe to be relatively devoid of life. This is the equatorial region of the Pacific ocean for a distance of from a few hundred to more than 2,000 miles west from South America. Evidence points toward a great dearth of marine life over this vast area. But Dr. W. E. Ritter, director of the Scripps Institution for Biological Research, on a recent voyage to Australia and while crossing the western edge of this so-called marine desert observed several species of sea birds which evidently fed on some sort of sea life as the nearest land was 1,000 miles away. Ship officers also reported having seen porpoises which must also get their food from waters about them, so that there cannot be an entire lack of marine organisms.

Britisher Saw the Joke

Seated around a table in a London grillroom were some Americans and one Englishman. A breezy American remarked: "I stayed out so late last night at a drinking club that when I started home I met myself going to the office."

There was a general laugh. The Englishman smiled doubtfully. Another American ventured: "You see the point, don't you? Just good-natured exaggeration." "Yes," said the Englishman a trifle more doubtfully, "I see. He would never recognize himself in that condition."

Making the Best of It

After trying unsuccessfully to open the door of the pantry, where the cakes were, the small boy turned to his brother and said: "It's no use, Tommy. Not one of those keys will fit." "All right, then," said Tommy, resignedly. "We'll wait until mother comes home and ask for something for being good boys."

Goat Herds of West Yield Large Profits

A generation ago the present site of Central park and the flats of Harlem to the north were the natural habitat of the goat, says the New York Times. Long since the animal practically disappeared from New York and the Eastern states, but meanwhile has been found to have many valuable uses and has reappeared again in amazing number on great ranges in the West.

It is proverbial that a goat can live on anything. His appetite is prodigious, and it has been discovered that when confined on limited areas all vegetation is wiped out. To graze great herds of goats requires wide areas, although the quality of food need not be good, nor the supply abundant. The problem has been studied with care by scientists, and the goat crop as a result increased in value.

Today the goat roams the pastures extending more or less continuously from northern California to southwestern Oregon. Most of the goat ranges are used all the year round. The smaller herds of only a few hundred take care of themselves, but to manage the large herds especially trained men and dogs are required.

Many of the breeds, notably the Angoras, are sheared once a year. They yield valuable crops of mohair. The goat's meat is also valuable, and their hides find a ready market. Many of the goats are milked and cheese manufactured on a considerable scale, as in Europe. The goat, instead of being the subject of joke, is rapidly becoming a valuable source of income.

Twin Camera Makes "Movies" and "Stills"

Frank S. Walton of Huntington Park, Cal., is the inventor of a twin motion-picture camera by means of which it is possible to take moving pictures and individual stills at the same time.

The camera is really not a single device but two separate machines, working independently of each other. Any desired still may be made during the course of the action by throwing the single-picture camera into operation without stopping the movement of the subject.

The motion picture part of the camera is fitted with four lenses after the manner of a microscope, by a device enabling any desired set of lenses to be used. One of these is a telephoto lens, used in getting close-ups of wild game. The Wilton camera was used in making a recent film of big game hunting in Africa.

NEW JOY IN LIFE AFFORDED BY AUTO

Prisoners on a limited range—hobbled horses in a pasture; this is the comparison which has been made by a well known writer on automotive topics lately in speaking of people who have no cars.

Specifically discussing the Chevrolet, which he described as a "low-priced, modern automobile which has become indispensable to the American family of ordinary income," he said: "The inspiring beauties of nature, the interesting and educational features of other places and other types of people and ways of living remain things to be read about, or seen dimly in cold photographs, until you are free to go to them at your convenience and pleasure."

That this is exactly what the Chevrolet dealers of the northwest are endeavoring in their display at auto shows, is the statement of sales agencies.
