FOOD POISONING AND ITS RELATION TO CANNING.

The tragic outbreak of botulism that recently occurred at Albany has so focused the attention of the entire state of Oregon on the problem as to regard it in the light of gravest concern.

It can be noted by the discussion in the foregoing paragraph that there are two types of food poisoning. The symptoms are distinct and they should be easily recognized and differentiated.

In the majority of cases of botulism the incubation period is from 24 to 48 hours, though the onset may occur earlier or may be delayed.

In this type of food poisoning always suspect preserved foods and meat products such as sausages. The food causing outbreaks of botulism has often been observed to be spoiled and housewives are warned not to taste such foods.

The majority of outbreaks of botulism have been due to underheated or underprocessed foods. It is fundamental that methods of canning must insure sufficient heat penetration and make allowance for altitude, and the acid or alkaline concentration of the products.

When in doubt of your food destroy it or boil it thoroughly before serving.
