RITA GIVES HARTON ELLWOOD HER CONFIDENCE

Chapter XL

Mollie came in late, and, as she so often did, sought my room to chat before she retired. She was full of enthusiasm over her evening and declared she and Rush had a wonderful time.

"He's a very entertaining companion," I said "So well-informed." "Is he?" absently.

"It seems to me, in the few times I have seen him, he has taught me how to appreciate many things I did not understand. Perhaps he was sorry for me, my ignorance."

"He's a splendid dancer," Mollie said.

"We didn't miss a single dance. And he knows how to order a good dinner, something I had not expected."

"He spoke very nicely of you, Rita. Says your devotion to mother has helped more than his medicines. Oh, well, I'm off to bed; Good night."

Left alone I thought of what Mollie had said, her disinterest in my replies. With her Rush Millbank had been rather serious, while always entertaining. With her he had danced, been gay like her other companions.

Someway I felt hurt. He had not thought I cared for things a girl like Mollie did. He had been as if I'd rather had treated me as he had Mollie, danced with me, instead of taking me to Museums, recommended books for me to read.

"I am young too!" I exclaimed, "almost as young as she."

But as I crept into bed I felt old—old as Mrs. Ellwood. I had put the fear of trouble through Jim Bond from me—to a certain extent, but others fears possessed me. What Mrs. Ellwood meant by her talk of Guy marrying? Was Mollie taking Rush Millbank from me? Would he cease caring to be with me now he had found Mollie willing to accept his attentions?

I buried my face in the pillow and cried bitterly for an hour. I had thought life was going to be easy for me. Would it ever be? Was I always have problems to face? Never be really happy and care free? The morning dawned bright and beautiful. My hard cry had done me good. I felt better and things looked different in the glorious sunshine that streamed through my window. I looked around my pretty, comfortable room, thought of the poor, shabby place I had called home when Aunt Agatha was alive. I was ungrateful to worry, to be miserable because I couldn't have everything I wanted.

I spent a couple of hours with Mrs. Ellwood, then started for a walk.

"May I join you, Rita?" Barton Ellwood asked.

He had called to see his aunt while I was dressing for the street. I hadn't known he was in the house.

"If you like," I replied, for once glad of his company.

You haven't been very happy, lately, Rita. Is it that man, Bond?"

"He did annoy me, but that is all over now."

"Do you mind telling me if you ever gave him reason to think you would marry him? Don't be angry, Rita, but—"

"I never talked to him three times in my life. The man is crazy, or else his conscience is troubling him. All he has really should have been mine, you know."

I had not resented Barton's question, strange as it seems. Something in his voice had made me feel he wasn't asking because he distrusted me.

"Tell me about it, if you will."

So once more I went over the last days of my life in Los Angeles. Aunt Agatha's promise that I should have the home, my surprise when I found myself left out of her will, and everything given to Bond, Barton did not speak until I finished.

"And this legacy that should have been yours has made him rich," he asked.

"Yes, he has found out on the acreage she left him."

"I think, Rita, that we might break that will, get back at least a part of that property for you. It is infamous that such a man should have an inheritance that rightly belongs to you."

"Oh, don't talk about it! I don't care anything about the money. Let him have it. Aunt Agatha never cared for me, never loved me. If she had I would perhaps feel different; but rather than have anything to do with Jim Bond again I should run away."

"Of course it is for you to decide, but I am sure Uncle Elmer would help in an attempt to right the wrong done if you are willing we should try."

"No, please don't say any more about it. It is very kind of you to think of me."

"I think about you a good deal, Rita, more than is good for my peace of mind."

Barton said the last in so low a voice I scarcely heard, then immediately changed the subject.
