VIOLET DARE

Author of "The Half-Time Wife"

DOROTHY LANE goes to New York to visit PERSEUS GRANT, and gets a chance to set in a motion picture as double for a famous star. She meets LAWRENCE FRENCH, a young publicity man.

VII—A STAR BY PROXY

I GOT to the studio a little early in the morning, and I sort of hoped I'd see Lawrence French, but I didn't. I was sent to the star's dressing room to get my clothes.

VIOLET DARE

the maid said. So I sat right down there at Mary Blank's dressing table, with all its lovely toilet articles and boxes of powder and powder puffs—over a dozen of them, I counted. Actresses and actors seem to have so many, but of course, when they go out on the floor they sometimes instead of taking a box of powder with them, take just one big puff over a dozen of them, I counted. And then use another to take the powder off on.

"You're the very image of her," the maid told me as she brushed my hair. "If I was you I'd watch her awfully careful—get on to her little tricks, and all that. She's talking about going back to the stage, and, anyway, she getting pretty old for pictures; they have to light her awfully carefully, or she shows lines. And she's begun to move—well, not like young girls do. That's one reason why they needed a double for her in this picture; the leading man she wanted isn't an awful lot bigger than she is, and when it came to catching her up in his arms and running upstairs with her, he never could do it. There's other stunts, too, but that's the one for today."

"And am I going to do that—I mean, is he going to—?" I couldn't go on; the idea of having a perfectly strange man put his arms around me was too much! Of course, I knew that they don't think anything of things like that in the movies, but still I felt sort of uncomfortable. "Oh, that's nothing at all," the maid assured me as she parted my hair where I'd never in the world have thought of parting it. "Wait till you've been in pictures a while—you'll think nothing of anything."

And you mark my words—if you're any good at all you'll stand up when Mary Blank leaves the movies. Now turn your head sideways and hold perfectly still!

Just then Mary Blank came in, and the maid dropped everything and simply rushed to help her off with her big, loose coat. She was wearing a perfectly mammoth bunch of orchids, and a darling little hat, but she looked absolutely haggard.

"I'm simply a rag," she declared, holding out her hands to have her gloves drawn off. "Danced till two last night—and then got up early this morning to go riding. I sweat I'm going to stop it; no matter how fat I get, it isn't worth so much exertion to keep thin." You could tell that she was dead tired from the way her voice dragged, but she smiled very sweetly at me, and told me I looked lovely. I was so surprised; I'd always thought that all stars were frightfully jealous.

"Now we're ready for you, Miss Lane," the director called finally.

It was eleven o'clock before we were out on the floor, ready to work. I met the leading man, who was awfully nice; he was young and very good looking, and he'd brought his dog to the studio with him; it was a darling Alredale puppy, and he and I got pretty well acquainted, playing with the dog, before we went to work.

"Now, we're ready for you, Miss Lane," the director called finally, after he'd made a close-up scene of Mary Blank and the leading man at the foot of the stairway. "You come over here and talk with him as Miss Blank did. Then he catches you up in his arms, as he did with her just now, and you throw your arms around his neck and drop your head on his shoulder, so that your face won't show. And hang on tight, so that he won't drop you."
