Many Uses Are Made of Centrifugal Force

When you get rid of the water in a mop by twisting it round you make use of one of the most important mechanical forces. Centrifugal force, as it is called (it is pronounced "cen-trif-ugal," by the way), drives the water from the mop just as it drove the stone that killed Goliath from David's sling.

An object, once set in motion, wants to continue traveling in the same direction, and resists any attempt to change this direction.

A stone tied to a piece of string and whirled in a circle pulls harder the faster it is whirled. If the string breaks, the stone will continue to travel in the direction it was moving at the instant the string broke; it would travel in a straight line were it not for the pull of the earth, which finally brings the stone to the ground. When turning a corner on a bicycle you instinctively lean inward; if you didn't centrifugal force would upset you.

A motorcar turning a corner at high speed would run on the two outside wheels, and the inside wheels would be lifted from the ground. Cars turning corners quickly are often shown in drawings with the outside wheels clear of the ground, which is quite wrong.

Many uses are made of centrifugal force; the modern cream separator collects the fat particles from the milk by its action.

The little governor that regulates the speed of a gramophone depends on it. And the ever-popular "roulette wheel" flings off its occupants by this force.

Residents of St. Kilda Rely on Birds for Food

St. Kilda, fifty miles west of the Outer Hebrides, is only three miles long and two miles broad, and, being very rocky, its inhabitants have to be pretty wide awake to make a living. To a great extent they depend upon sea birds for their food supply, and one fowler has been known to catch 620 birds in a single day.

The fowler sets out with a long deal pole, nine or ten feet long, with a horsehair noose at the end camouflaged by gannets' quills. Puffins are numerous on the island, and the fowler creeps as near the birds as possible without giving them the alarm, thrusts forth his rod along the ground, works the noose close to an unsuspecting puffin, and very dextrously drops the noose over the bird's head and secures it.

The birds are treated much like herrings, except that they need a preliminary plucking. When that is done they are split open, kippered and hung in long strings across the cottage ceiling. In this way they will keep for an indefinite period, and provide a puffin breakfast at a moment's notice.

A Faulty Recovery

Norman has made his last appearance in the social whirl for this season, or at least until a certain matron by the name of Curtis has had time to cool off and let her better, forgiving nature assert itself.

It happened at a dance at the club. Norman found that he had a certain dance with Mrs. Curtis. Mrs. Curtis is considerably above the average in weight. Then, on top of this fact, she did not dance well. Now, Norman dislikes fat women and detests to dance with poor dancers. So he proposed to Mrs. Curtis that they sit out the dance.

They were watching the other dancers, when Norman rather absently, as much to make some effort at conversation as anything, observed: "Isn't Miss Rodgers pretty? So tall, and slender, and graceful!" "Oh, I suppose so," Mrs. Curtis agreed, rather grudgingly. "Then Norman realized the implied comparison and blurted out: "Oh, but I like fat women, too!"

China Wood Oil From Nuts. Tung or China wood oil is an important raw material in the manufacture of varnishes, wall paints and enamels, and is largely used by the linoleum and printing ink industries. ARE RUM RUNNERS USING SUBMARINES?

For some time past vague rumors have been circulating through New York's underworld that a Brooklyn man, recognized as the "King of Rum Runners," who handles only "1,000 case lots," was actually using two submarines to make daily trips to Rum Row, 15 miles off the Jersey coast, and bring in his illicit cargoes. Pilot E. P. Lott and Photographer E. A. Smith have been taking aerial photographs of Boston Point, on the Hudson River, for the Westchester County Park Commission. This photograph, taken from a height of 5,500 feet, reveals what appears to be two submarines running just under the surface of the water. They were moving against the tide and could not, therefore, have been waterlogged logs. The Navy Department has announced officially that there were no naval submarines in the river, and that none would have been allowed to submerge there, anyway, because of the danger of being rammed by surface vessels.
