NEW YORK, Oct. 1.—While the New York Giants enjoy a distinct advantage over their world series opponents, the Washington Senators in the infield, quite the reverse is true in the outfield, according to the official figures for the past season.

There is a probability that John McGraw will shift his outfield to suit the occasion and thus the averages will be juggled up somewhat but the best combination that McGraw can place in the outfield will trail any combination which Stanley Harris can call on.

Neither Washington, Coffeyville, Kansas, nor Pittston, Penn. is allowing the political to interfere with its urban delight in the baseball sensation of the century, the first Washington pennant.

After the battle the heroes rest, allow themselves to be interviewed and prepare to write masterpieces for the papers about what happens on the field during the series. Dinners are being professed recklessly, flags waved in Coffeyville, the home of Walter Johnson, and in Pittston, the winter harbor of Stanley Harris.
