GOOD GAS HAS LOW "BOILING POINT"

"Thousands of gallons of gasoline are used in this locality, but there are comparatively few motorists who really know what is good gasoline," states Mr. C. D. Pies.

"A good gasoline should have a low initial boiling point for easy starting and quick getaway without excessive use of the choke; an even range of 'boiling points' to insure steady, clean and complete combustion; and as high and end point as the climatic conditions will allow to insure the maximum mileage.

"All automobile owners expect from a dollar's worth of gasoline a dollar's value in quick, smooth response to the starter and accelerator. They desire easy, wing-like speed along boulevards and straightaways; boundless driving power, that lifts them, soaring, up a hill or through heavy going; and they ask for flexibility that will allow them to slip deftly, swiftly, into and out of traffic 'holes'.

"Thousands of users of General gasoline state that they find all of their expectations filled in the 'clean power' sold at the green-and-white signs, through the independent dealers. They state that by using this gasoline they experience no difficulty in getting immediate action from their starter, no matter whether it be mid-summer or near the New Year. They have given General the supreme test, both in summer and winter, and have found it not lacking, whether it be in speed across the valleys or in pulling-power over the hills."

Mr. Pies explains that this unusually high quality found in the product of the General Petroleum Corporation is due directly to the process used in refining. He states that the same principle holds true in the refining of good gasoline as in the chemistry of "oil." Should a dozen or more students be given a glass of water to purify, it is highly probable that the same degree of exactness would not be found in the result of each. Some would have accomplished their task to a much greater extent than others; due either to the care and diligence with which they worked, or to the method they used.

"In the same way in the production of gasoline, starting with crude material of similar base, in the end a great difference may be noted in the final product. Each drop of crude petroleum has added away a small amount of gasoline, some benzene and lubricating oils of various weights. It is the duty of the refiner to separate ate these in the proper manner, and if he is to have a balanced product of the first class, this must be done accurately. The General Petroleum Corporation feels that it has accomplished this end, and as a result has given to the motoring public a good gasoline, that will stand the challenge of "fill up and let the engine decide."
