find some word of the entombed men. Only two rescue workers had been able to send word to the surface and that word was not encouraging. R. M. Lambie, chief mine inspector of West Virginia, and a companion were the first to go down. They pushed their way past the debris to the stable where the mine horses were kept. All the 36 animals were dead. Then they pushed on into one of the headings. The air was bad, they said. That was all. They could find no trace of the men and when they came to surface experts from every mine in the district organized themselves into groups, ready to explore every heading to its further reaches.

While not definitely determined, gas was believed to have caused the explosion and late last night, mine Superintendent Benton Mitchell said he did not believe any of the men could be alive.

Soon after the explosion occurred there were reports that dynamite had been dropped into the shaft but these were later denied. The mine opened on a non-union basis last October and employs about 250 men.

Lambie reported that the mine was badly damaged inside and that rescue workers would find it hard going through the shattered passage ways. Some hope was held out for the men because of the quick work done by mechanics in repairing one of the mine fans. This apparatus was not seriously damaged and within a few hours after the blast it was operating and forcing air down to the imprisoned men. Electric lights al-
