Lost Her Lunch

When I was seventeen I weighed nearly 200 pounds. I had been invited to a picnic and had been asked to furnish two fried chickens. I boarded a street car so crowded that standing room was at a premium. The conductor called a street and a large passenger with two suitcases center-passed through the crowd just inside the entrance. When the pressure was diminished a veritable rain of fried chicken began. First the ground stuck with fat, then the strips. I was too embarrassed to speak. When all the chicken had been flung to the floor I slipped away as if to disclaim any previous ownership.

MOTHER KILLS HER 2 CHILDREN, THEN SELF; ILL HEALTH

ABERDEEN, Wash., April 21.—Despondent over ill health, which in a note she said had also spoiled her children's health, Mrs. Maria Taskinen, aged 49, a farm woman living about six miles east of here, this morning killed her two young daughters and committed suicide by slaying her own husband. John Taskinen, her husband, fouling the three lying side by side in the kitchen in a pool of blood, when he returned from Aberdeen. In a note found by officers, Mrs. Taskinen said: "I cannot live any longer because my health is gone and I have spoiled my children's health because I have been weak. I want to go with my children from this world. Do not blame my loving husband." The note was written in the Finnish language. A razor, with which the woman slashed the throats of her children and then cut her own, was found near the bodies.

Blind People's Sense of Touch Gets Tired

Touch, the second sense the blind turn to (after hearing), has been perhaps most in the spotlight, but at the same time easily the most underrated of all the senses they utilize. First of all, it has a fatigue factor second only to smell, as tactile reading, its most conspicuous application, demonstrates. Apparently, it should be as easy to read lines of embossed characters with the finger tips as it is lines of printed characters with the eye, once the alphabet is mastered. But it is not. Touch simply tires out. In my own case (and I have been reading by touch 18 years), says Charles McGee Adams in the Atlantic Monthly, two hours is the extreme limit for continuous reading, and long before that the end organs are so irritated and there is such a general restlessness that it is most difficult to proceed. The general usefulness of touch is also limited by the fact that it is a motor sense; by which I mean that the fingers must be moved over the surface of an object instead of merely brought in contact with it. If an impression is to result, many of the seeing show they are not aware of this when they simply place the hand of a blind person on an object. Reach, too, sets sharply defined bounds to touch's perspective, often resulting in a warped or fragmentary concept of an object, as Kipling's story of the six blind men and the elephant aptly illustrates. It is quite impracticable to touch many objects such as moving machinery, hot metal or live wires, at all—which restricts the usefulness of the sense still further.

Birds' Sense of Duty Helped Out Sportsman

A fresh variety of an old yarn which may be familiar to sportsmen, crops up in an Irish correspondent's letter to the London Field in the following form: "One of our party amuses us with a tall story, classical in the district, viz, how he was coming up to shoot on the moor one morning in winter, all by himself, and saw sitting on the wall, a cat. Now, as has been observed, he was all alone, no witnesses, shooting for the pot and game was scarce. Therefore, contrary to all rules of sportsmanship, he fired at the sitting bird, but when the smoke of his black-powder cartridge had cleared away, there was ground still was sitting on the wall. So he fired at it again, same result; he expended 12 cartridges, still the bird remained on the wall. 'Well,' he says, turning to us, 'I thought the bird was bewitched; so I walked up to it, and it flew away, and I went on quite bewildered and, as you believe it, on the further side of the wall I picked up 12 dead grouse. You see, there were 13 in the eavey sheltered under the wall, and the one I first fired on was the sentry on the lookout for danger, and when he fell the next took his place, and so on."
