The Smart Ensemble

The Highly Feminine Type of Costume Vies in Favor With the Boyish Simplicity of the Tailleur

The spring season is a doubly happy one for the young miss who has at least two minds about the correct costume for all occasions. The tailleur which is creeping into popularity with its boyish mode has a strong competitor in the ensemble costume of lovely lines, which, however, boasts a flare or trimming in fur or embroidery—or sometimes both. The charming simplicity of the ensemble which Colleen Moore, in "Sally," a First National picture, wears, shows a decided trend towards the femininity of the mode. Straight, of course, are its lines, the coat being long and boasting the charm of simplicity, relies upon its fur trimming for elaborateness and richness. The coat is of heavy silk, with a shining lustre, which contrasts with distinction the fur which borders the cuffs and outlines the collar and fur of the coat. The frock which is worn beneath is of crepe silk, in lighter tones, slim of line, with the flare at the bottom which declares the newness of the mode. The pleasing ruffle of the bottom is of dyed lace to match the silk. Bands in darker tones outline the collar, short sleeves, and down the center of the frock, and down the sides. The lining of the coat introduces the newest fad of Paris—the lining which must match the frock beneath it, and in this case, a charming crepe silk in beige color. Satin, which fashions so many of the newest ensembles, is worn with much chic in the afternoons in the smartest of restaurants, and is also correctly worn at teas and luncheons. Kasha, the smartest of woolen fabrics, is also much used in smart tailleur and ensembles. Kasha, in natural and dyed in the favorite tones, is a happy combination with rich furs and embroideries, as well as in the tailored modes.
