WHITE, MISSING WITNESS, SHOWS SELF IN COURT

the will under which estate was transferred to the child. He testified that Mrs. McClintock had wanted to name "Julie" (Mrs. Shepherd) as a co-guardian, he did not know who was meant, not being acquainted with the Shepherds at that time.

Mrs. McClintock and Mrs. Shepherd were schoolyard friends in Kansas. Reichmann stated that Mrs. Shepherd had no knowledge of Mrs. McClintock's will until he informed her of it a short time after her friend's death. He, it was said, who suggested that Mrs. Shepherd take charge of the McClintock home and he made an arrangement for her to "get some ready cash."

Reichmann insisted he thought he should have been compensated for helping take care of the McClintock boy, although he did not "wash his face, comb his hair and feed him".

Mrs. Shepherd got a personal allowance of $75 a month and $400, later increased to $700 a month for expenses of the McClintock household.

Much of Reichmann's testimony dealt with stories of difficulties with the Shepherds threshed out in the probate court over guardianship of young McClintock.

Billy McClintock's fatal illness followed a catarrhic diarrhea, first being regarded as an intestinal disorder and was attributed to a then prevalent epidemic of typhoid fever caused by consumption of contaminated oysters. Dr. Rufus Stolp, one of the two physicians who attended the youth, testified today.

Called as the state's third witness, the doctor proved to have testimony regarded as so favorable to the defense that Attorney Stewart sought to have him recalled as a defense witness. One of the accusations against Shepherd was that he had assured Billy's death by administering a cathartic after his intestines had become perforated through ravages of the disease.

Dr. Stolp testified that he prescribed even a later dose of a cathartic.

The doctor testified that Shepherd had nothing to do with hiring other doctors and nurses, that they were called in the usual way by himself and that they treated the youth entirely according to instructions of himself and Dr. Herriek.

The nurses he regarded as experienced and competent, said the doctor.

Alexander Reichmann was recalled for one question and then the second medical witness, Dr. J. B. Herriek, took the stand.

Mr. Crowe and his first assistant, George E. Gorman, carried on against Stewart, who appeared alone for the defense.

Dr. Herriek qualified as an expert in the treatment of typhoid fever and testified along lines similar to that of Dr. Stolp. He agreed there was an epidemic of oyster-caused typhoid at the time of Billy's illness and death and that Billy had eaten oysters at a time well within the usual period of incubation of the disease.

PITTSBURGH Pa., June 12.—Maintaining for several hours that he was Robert White, missing witness in the Shepherd case at Chicago, Frank Laros confessed today that he had lied about it. Laros, held on forgerly and false pretenses charges, maintained that he was White until he was confronted with news from Chicago that White had appeared in court there today.
