A BRIDE'S DIARY

A Love Story of Today
By Idah McGlone Gibson

Cleo Madison, entertaining friends, reads from her grandmother's quaint, modest diary. The chapter incident are inaudible at its quaintness and suppressed desire. When the girls leave, Cleo plans her elopement with Paul Armstrong, U. S. A., a boyhood sweetheart. None the less, she indulges in a peevish party with Chuck Adams last evening. Chuck is wealthy and Cleo's parents wish her to marry him; so does Chuck. Cleo's parents, also social climbers who have lost their money, wish Paul to marry Connie Terhune, very rich and in love with Paul. Despite these desires of the parents and Cleo's wanderings as to whether she really does love Paul, the two are married. Almost immediately Cleo begins to learn that marriage is not altogether a path of roses. However, the parents are required to pay for the wedding and the young couple depart for the honeymoon. On the train Cleo has an augural dream which indicates the problems she will have to face. When the newlyweds arrive at the post, Paul is assigned to duty at once and leaves Cleo, who knows nothing of housekeeping, to shift for herself during the day. Johnson, a "stranger" decided to Paul's quarters, helps out enormously so Cleo is able to serve tea when Col. Beldon, the commanding officer, comes to pay his respects. The colonel, a "silly knur", has become involved in compromising circumstances with Rita Thorndike, whom Cleo likes immediately. Rita is absolutely gorgeous, but is having a hard time of it, especially as her husband is a no-good rutter. Cleo learns all about aita and things rapidly draw toward a crisis.

Rita decides to flee and is aided by Cleo. This move presents difficulties, but the girls decide to "carry on." Johnson, the stranger, aids them subtly.

The two girls, reading Cleo's grandmother's diary, see how impossible such a move would have been in the past.

FINAL PREPARATIONS. I looked over at Rita. She had tears in her eyes. I was glad of it, for I wanted to take her mind off of her own trouble. I made no comment, however, but went on reading my grandmother's diary.

And oh, I am so afraid to tell Thomas. I know he is going to be very angry with me. I know he will object to a child even more than I. Already I have found out that Thomas is very mean. However, I am going to inform him of the approaching event tonight.

When I think of telling him I find myself trembling for Thomas has the faculty of blaming me for everything that goes wrong in our home no matter if he is wholly or partly to blame for it. I must tell him right away, however, for I have been seeing to it lately that I am afraid I may not be able to do all the housework in the future.

Yesterday I fainted while I was doing the washing and it was a long while before I was able to finish the clothes. Sapper was consequently delayed and Thomas was proportionately irritable.

I expect I should have told him then the reason of my dereliction, but it was too weary, however, for I think of even discussing the matter with him.

"Poor woman," Rita remarked softly. "I have often thought that our grandmothers were no happier than the wives of today, although the ministers would have us think so, and they point to our growing divorce calendars to prove it."

"Of course we're happier than our grandmothers ever were, I interrupted. "The reason why there is so much fuss made about the many divorces today is because a woman can get away from the man she hates. She doesn't always live something which she can do to earn her living—just as you have your music. She doesn't have to live in a state of legal prostitution as did our remote ancestors who knew of no other way to keep from starving."

Rita Thorndike smiled up at my face. "Dear Cleo, you give me a great deal of courage. When Bill told me the last time and told me that again I must humiliate myself once more to save him, I determined to leave him and all this behind even if I had to leave him behind to do it. Don't worry about me now though, Cleo. I can make good with my music. I wish you had a piano. I think I could convince you."

"You have already convinced me, dear. You know I have a theory that anyone can do anything in this world if he wants to do it badly enough. And if that sweet husband of yours will only leave you alone—"

"That's the only thing I've been afraid of, but I haven't dared to say it even to you, but I hope he won't know where I am for a long while."

"Oh, I have it, Rita. I didn't even tell Chuck your name. Why not change it?"

"That's a great idea. I will. What'll it be? I'll call myself Angela."

"No, I don't like Angela. It's too starchy."

"Then how's Mary?"

"Too common." I think Clara—Clara Johnson."

"Sounds like a cook. This name choosing is much harder than I thought it would be. I have it. Let's look in the telephone book. I really think both names sound better with my own initials for I have them on some handkerchiefs and my toilet things. So let's decide on Ruth for my first name."

I opened the telephone book at the 'R's, and with a pin I plucked it in the page and found to our horror that I had speared the name Tinkiepaugh.

"Good Heavens, I can't be Ruth Tinkiepaugh and be a pianist. It isn't done."

We both laughed hysterically, and we decided to try again. This time we picked out Thorwaldson. "Ruth Thorwaldson. They don't go together."

"Then let's say Rhoda. Rhoda Thorwaldson—the Swedish pianist."

We probably would have missed our train laughing over the matter if Johnson had not come in soon after. "Give me the key to your house, Mrs. Thorndike, and I'll meet you at the station."

We both looked at the time. Neither of us had realized it was so late. It was seven o'clock. "Here is the front door key," she said, holding it out to him. I have looked at all the other doors. He took it silently but just as he was going out he turned—

"Which one of you is going first?" he asked and then not waiting for an answer, he went out and closed the door.

Understanding flashed over Rita's face. "Isn't that man clever? Not one word about us leaving the house together. He just asked us which one was going first."

"Great isn't he. I'd never have thought about going on separate cars would you, Rita?"

"No, but now that he has suggested it, I'll go first and you can follow."
