Tea Gowns and Negligees

Beauty and Originality Combine to Make an Exquisite Robe for the Leisure Hours of Barbara La Marr

Gowns and suits may be governed by the latest fashions from Paris, but the negligee reserves the right to suit the whim of its wearer, both in design and in texture.

In selecting the negligee, or tea gown, the imagination is allowed free rein, and often combinations of colors and material result in a thoroughly unique and gorgeous garment.

Barbara LaMarr, who wears with distinction a large and most unusual wardrobe in "The Heart of a Siren," her newest First National film, has selected a stunning tea gown which uses lavishly ostrich trimming in picturesque and exotic fashion.

There have been few gowns so selected which have equalled Miss LaMarr's tea gown for sheer loveliness and beauty of line and color. Designed along flowing lines, its wide sleeves, in medieval manner, are outlined with wide borders of fluffy ostrich trimming, while this same dainty trimming outlines the neck. The gown itself is draped with an eye to beauty and proves most effective in its soft silken material.

Just now the desire to wear pyjama type of negligee is receiving warm feminine approval, as this type of negligee allows greater freedom of motion, though possibly offering less enchantment than the lacy and long sleeved negligee which was formerly worn by both young and old during leisure hours.

The pyjama type of negligee also allows a varied selection of materials and designs to meet the sartorial requirements of its wearer. They appear in the most bizarre and unusual of fabrics, and are designed frequently along lines which include the types of costumes worn in foreign lands. For instance, there is the pyjama which hints at Egyptian origin, while the Russian atmosphere is keenly felt in the tailored and lavishly embroidered uniform effect, and the pyjama negligee which is most frequently used is that which is Chinese in feeling and is fashioned of soft silk, with silken and unsewn embroidery. Japan and other countries of the far east are represented in these favored negligees and tea gowns.
