FARM POINTERS.

To keep the soil in maximum production in Oregon it has become necessary to rotate much of the crop land. This also requires careful handling and proper use of fertilizer on many Oregon soils. Definite amounts of plant food, especially nitrogen, sulfur, phosphorus, and potassium are required for each crop unit. These amounts are most economically retained and replenished by crop rotation and fertilizer.

The loganberry is rather luxuriant grower, and frequently its young shoots are from 18 to 20 feet in length by autumn. If allowed to grow naturally, these spread out on the ground in all directions and are in the way of pickers and tillage tools. During the growing season, therefore, they should be trained to run along the rows. Short stakes or wire hooks may be used to keep them in place three or four stakes or hooks being sufficient for each plant.

Grinding small grains for pig food showed a saving of 16 per cent over feeding whole grains in the average of all tests conducted at the Corvallis and the Union experiment stations. The average saving resulting from grinding small grains over the United States was 12 per cent. The percentage is figured on the amount of feeding necessary to produce 100 pounds of gain.

Every rotation should contain a cash crop, at least one legume, a cultivated crop, manured and livestock feeding crop, so distributed as to give economical farm labor. Grain is diked in after a row crop. The land is seeded to clover and the clover turned under for a row crop. This makes plowing necessary only every third year.

Sour soils have a more or less characteristic vegetation. Common plants on sour soils are red sorrel, moss, golden rod, briars, and butter cup.

In some rotation experiments at the college, rotation has resulted in 50 per cent higher yield.

CANADIANS BEGIN TALK OF GENERAL ELECTION IN FALL

OTTAWA, Aug. 8.—While pro-rogation of the Canadian Parliament has been followed by the usual political joll, the possibility of a general election this fall arouses a strong undercurrent of interest. For several months there has been conjecture as to whether the Mackenzie King government, now in its fourth year of office, will follow the usual course of appealing to the country before the expiration of the five-year term, and whether an other session of Parliament will be held before dissolution. A question from the Labor party of the House of Commons on those points shortly before Parliament was prorogued was answered by Premier King in a non-committal manner.

Expectation of a general election this fall was high until the Liberal government of Nova Scotia, in power for 40 years, was defeated in the election in June when the Conservatives were successful in 40 out of 43 constituencies. On August 10th another Liberal provincial government, that of New Brunswick, will appeal to the people. The result here, it is said, will have a strong influence on Premier King and his advisors as to whether or not Parliament shall be dissolved. In the meantime Premier King has retired to his country home north of the Dominion capital where he can rest and review the situation. His decision with regard to an election this year cannot be very long delayed, as at least 45 days must elapse between the issuance of election writs and polling day.

In some constituencies members of Parliament already have engaged in campaign work. Arthur Meighen, leader of the Opposition in the Dominion Parliament, and head of the Conservative party, is planning to make a number of speeches in the provinces of Manitoba. If an election is to be held the middle of October is mentioned as the most probable time for it.

EX-DOUGHBOY TELLS A. E. F. METHOD OF HANDLING GASOLINE

"Every time I drive up to a gasoline pump and watch a service man touch a lever or turn a crank and see five, ten or fifteen gallons of gasoline measured out automatically into my tank, it makes me think of the way we handled gasoline in the A. E. F.—because it's so different," remarked the ex-doughboy.

"How did you handle it over there?" asked the boy who was filling his tank with General gasoline, putting water in the radiator and rendering all the little service attentions which the modern station extends.

"We used to get it in big drums out of the transport depots, and usually had to turn one of them up and let the gas gurgle out of the bung hole. Sometimes, if we were lucky, we had some kind of a spigot for it to run through—and maybe we had a funnel to help guide it into the tank, but a lot of times it didn't. It was just a case of slop it out into a can and have it into the car the best way we could."

"Petrol, the Tommies used to call it, and they'd get it sometimes in cans that held a little over two gallons, the way we measure it. Believe me, it used to be great sport trying to get transported around, even in the sections where we had our own depots. Wasn't any such thing as driving up to a pump and almost every corner and having a sleek looking kid wait on you."

"Still, our fellows got pretty handy finding it and knew how to wait on themselves. I guess that's where a lot of the buddies who are running service stations of their own now got their experience."

"When I'm driving around, up and down the coast, here, I see quite a bunch of the boys who used to wear khaki and do 'squads right,' are now tending pumps and doing the double quick to get air in somebody's tires."

"Yes; I guess the way the gasoline business has grown since the war gave a lot of fellows a chance to get into it for themselves. That's one thing about General gasoline. Whenever you see a green and white sign with General on it, you know that station is an independent—owned by a fellow who is running a business of his own and not by one of the big oil companies, because the General Petroleum corporation only sells through independent dealers."—Adv.

A BRIDE'S DIARY

A Love Story of Today
By Idah McGlone Gibson

A PROBLEM BUT NO SOLUTION

My husband set up in bed, and certainly took notice, when I declared myself out of all his plans. The sudden exertion, however, made him dizzy, for his head wobbled about a little, and he sank back on his pillow.

A vagrant thought entered my brain. I wondered if that cut near his temple was going to make a man of it. I know Paul would hate me every time he looked in the glass. He is very vain over his good looks. He swore a little under his breath, and put his hands up to his head. Poor man, I suppose it did hurt him.

"After this," I said to myself, "I cannot call myself a perfect lady. At least the ladies of my grandmother's time would not have done such a thing. They would never have shied vases at their husbands!"

It took Paul a minute or two after he got his head back on the pillow to recover from his sudden vertigo. Then he said, in a very nasty tone of voice:

"You asked me what I meant by 50-50. I expect you find it very different for me to borrow money from Connie than for you to accept a loan from your old lover, Cleo!"

"Yes, a little different," I said with a shrug of my shoulders, "for with all other circumstances alike I do not think it would be as bad for a woman to ask money from a man as for a man to borrow money from a woman. There is always an implication in it that a man is not successful, and that he has to humble himself in feminine eyes."

"Perhaps it's all right, however, and as you have set the fashion, I am not sure that I will not follow it."

"What do you mean, follow it, Cleo?"

"Just what I say. Surely you know that I have never borrowed a cent of money from Chick Adams, but I am telling you that since you have started the game, I may come in. What's the price of checks—self-respect or principle?"

"Don't be flippant, Cleo. I see you don't understand in any way the state of mind I was in when I telegraphed Connie."

"Do you imagine I have never been in a state of mind over money since I married you? Do you imagine I was not almost crazy when you came home from the Colonel's and told me you had lost $500 out of the six your father had given you? And how do you suppose I felt when you told me about the bank while trying to recoup you had lost five hundred more?"

"I didn't telegraph to Chick Adams. I didn't even telegraph to my dear old dad. At any sacrifice to himself he would send it to me. But now you have done this, I think I will follow you, and get money anywhere I can. You know as well as I that in the mind of the world the wife still holds the position that Tennessee gave her: 'As the husband is, the wife is.' If I am mated to a man without any real code of ethics, who is selfish and greedy, I think I am the same kind of a human being."

"Oh, come, Cleo, don't go comminuating about it that way," said Paul. "You know you got that $500 from Chick this morning. Why mayn't I receive a like amount from Connie this evening?"

"Paul Armstrong," I interrupted, "ston adding insult to the injury you have already done me."

"Then tell me where you got that money. You certainly gave a check for $500 to Colonel Beldon. Either you hid to me this morning about the amount of money you had in the bank, or some one gave you $500 before the time we had our quarrel and the time that Colonel Beldon called on us."

"I turned on my heel and went to the window. This seemed to exasperate Paul.

"Don't," he said, "why don't you talk? Say something—say something!"

"I'd really like to say something to you, Paul, if I could say it politely, but at the present moment I cannot think of a polite word to say to you, so here it is, tersely and baldly: It is none of your business, friend and husband, where I got that money!"

"You little vixen! You never showed this side of yourself in all the years we were growing up together. You always seemed to me to be a person of charming disposition. What has come over you, Cleo?"

"Nothing except that I am finding out that marriage does not promote good nature. It's a mistake, Paul, all a mistake. I don't know where the love has gone which we had for each other, but this moment I can only see hate in your eyes, and at this moment—well, I almost wish—I almost wish—that I was home."

"With Chick?" asked Paul jealously.

Tomorrow — "Is Love Real, Paul?"

AMERICAN WILL ORGANIZE ARTIC REINDEER INDUSTRY

SEATTLE, Aug. 10.—W. T. Lopp, chief of the Alaska division of the United States Bureau of Education for 21 years, left his home here this summer for Baffin Land, the Canadian island between Greenland and North America, to organize the reindeer industry for the Hudson Bay company.

Until this year Lopp was in charge of reindeer throughout Alaska. In the winter of 1896 a party composed of Lieut. D. H. Jarvis, Lieut. E. B. Berthoff, Dr. S. J. Call and Lopp drove a small herd of reindeer 300 miles to Point Barrow, Alaska, from Cape Prince of Wales, on the east side of Bering Strait, to relieve a whaling fleet frozen in and starving.

The first reindeer in Alaska were landed in 1892 at Teller, 50 miles from Cape Prince of Wales. Lapps were brought to Alaska to teach the Indians and Eskimos how to care for the animals. The raising of reindeer has become one of Alaska's largest industries.

The Hudson Bay company placed a small number of reindeer on Baffin Land four years ago at the suggestion of Vilhna mur Stefansson, the explorer, and since then the herd has grown to 790.

The Danish government is negotiating with Lopp to introduce the raising of reindeer on Greenland.

PIONEER STAGE DRIVER VISITING WITH OLD FRIENDS

George L. Chase, of Yreka, for eight years a stage driver from Graves Creek south, and one of the few surviving men who drove stages in the old pioneer days, was a visitor at the Clough home near Glendale, Mr. Chase and Mr. Clough having driven stage together in Nevada in early days, and the families are long acquaintances.

Mr. Chase drove stage in Nevada in 1869, and left that state during the Modoc war, when he handled an army ambulance. In 1874 he started driving stage in Jackson county, and handled a six-horse team through the wild country south of Graves Creek for eight years.

"We didn't have any pavement in those days," Mr. Chase says. "On the way up here I was looking over some of the old roads, and how we ever got through that country with the loads we carried is more than I can figure out. It was work for a clear headed man, and it was hard work too. We drew $5 a month, and considered we were getting well paid. We got good grub though and that was worth a whole lot."

Mr. Chase, who is now 73 years of age, recently gave up active farming, having previously conducted a large dairy farm near Yreka. He is now aiding the fair association in reviving the Yreka fair and race program, which for many years was a great feature in that district.

GERMAN INFLATION PERIOD AFFECTED PUBLIC HEALTH

BERLIN, Aug. 10.—That the period of inflation was directly responsible for the retrogression of public health conditions in Germany, was maintained by Dr. Schele, the minister of the interior, in response to a query by the Social Democrats in the Reichstag, he declared that the marked improvement of the prevailing conditions of health noticeable a few years after the war was completely undone by the inflation period of 1923. Especially a spread of constitutional diseases, like tuberculosis and rickets was recorded.

The number of un-nourished and anaemic children increased to an alarming degree as the inflation progressed. Shortly after the stabilization of the country's currency, a very pronounced improvement in general health conditions became apparent. The death rate of 1924 and the early part of this year has been surprisingly low, lower in fact than ever before in peace times, or, for that matter, in any other country. Today the mortality from tuberculosis in Germany is lower than ever before.

But for all that, declared Dr. Schele, the number of children with tuberculosis and rickets is far too great. He described how the government was striving incessantly to improve health conditions among the children of the poorer classes by means of sanitary control and instruction in the schools, but especially with the aid of numerous exhibitions of hygiene and demography throughout the country.

PERIA ANGERED AT SOVIET DECLARATION OF THE TEHRAN REPORT.

BERLIN, Aug. 8.—An official report received by the Persian Legation from Teheran on the recent Tarcoman conflict conveys a bitter arraignment of the Soviet authorities.

The Russian are accused of wilfully violating many of the agreements of the Russo-Persian treaty. Numerous instances of existing boundaries in northern Persia are mentioned. Attacks on the Persian border police at Alepou, Koussah and Chat and the establishing of Russian border posts on Persian territory are recorded.

The worst infringement of Persian inviolability is considered to be the deflection of the only river supplying three villages on the Chorasian border with water. This has been a cause of much suffering among the inhabitants of the district, besides creating serious economic and hygienic disturbances. To all complaints from Teheran, the authorities at Moscow are said to have given evasive and dilatory replies.

HEAT MADE BRITONS THIRSTY

LONDON, Aug. 8.—The recent prolonged spell of hot weather, most unusual for England, has been responsible for an unusual consumption of lemons. In four weeks $2,500,000 of the fruit have been consumed in Great Britain. That quantity represents the imports for June and is 15,000,000 more than the usual monthly consignments from Italy.
